Where do we go from here?

Do you ask yourself that question?

I do.

I believe you have, too, on a daily basis. I am, at this moment, running and owning three businesses, Afterburn Media LLC / Blue Line Art, a comic book store called Comics2Games and Skystorm Studios. Afterburn/BLA and C2G take up most of my time, along with family, leaving very little time for my studio projects. I know many of our readers are doing the same thing, working day jobs and creating in the evenings and on the weekends.

That was one of the reasons we created Sketch Magazine: to offer advice and tips to help make the time that you do have to spend creating comics more productive. Sketch should be that reference book sitting next to your art table. We will continue to fill our pages with as much information as we can cram into 64 pages.

If you have ideas or suggestions for articles or tips on something to do with artwork, please pass them along.

Unfortunately, I have to push my own column on creating webcomics back to next issue. Too many comic shows and other things getting in my way of putting it together...

Next issue: an interview with Steve Rude from Rude Dude Productions. And quite possibly, the return of Chuck Dixon on the art of writing comics! Along with whatever great stuff we can cram in...

Take care,

Robert

Comic books are a fun medium! Blue Line Arts' goals are aimed toward enhancing this art form - and others - through knowledge and quality art supplies. We try hard to make certain that you, the reader, have the comic book technique information you require for your personal enjoyment of this great field.

Any statements made, expressed or implied in Sketch Magazine are solely those of columnists or persons being interviewed and do not represent the editorial position of the publisher, who does not accept responsibility for such statements. "Yes. It's actually sensational! I think it's totally unique from anything else I've seen on the market. What I admire is you hold no information back. What is shown and taught is totally forthright and comprehensive.

Best of Luck with this venture, I hope it continues to be a great success.

Best!
Gene"

The Gene in this case is the venerable artist of the Silver Age, Gene Colan. What a thrill to see such a message to us here at Sketch Magazine. I would love to see more of them, but I really don't mind seeing the ones with criticisms or other comments. If there's an issue (of any kind, quality of printing or paper, content, even the fonts that we use), it helps to get the perspective of our readers. If there's praise, we'll take it. If it's a point of criticism, we'll take that, too, and address it, then do what we can to fix it if it's fixable.

Send us letters.

As I've said before, I've been on both sides of the portfolio table and part of my mission here is to help conduct the flow of information and advice from the pro to the learner, from the writer to the reader, etc. This stuff isn't Secret Knowledge, but Pearls of Wisdom. Getting it to you is a big part of why I'm here.

Learn from it. Pass it on to someone else.

We are many things to so many people. We are entertainers, educators, illuminators, you-name-it. Such a diversity of roles might seem self-serving to some, that if we manage to reach across the lines we'll pluck a harp string that resonates with someone, somewhere or in some way and sell more of these magazines. You might think that and you might be correct...sort of.

Other things we are might be are: readers, writers, artists and fans ourselves. Another function in which we serve is being forum for some of the talented professionals that make things happen (these things we call comics), comics we like, talents who can teach you a thing or two, again you-name-it. We are the chalkboard on which they can draw and teach. That's us: Sketch Magazine.

Sketch on the Web

There's a growing community of creators doing things online in all kinds of forums and websites. One of those we're kind of proud of is our own Blue Line/Afterburn Media Message board. There are several folks that regularly post and contribute. Check it out. Just go to www.bluelinepro.com and click the link to the Forums.

There's a MySpace page now, too. Just go to www.myspace.com/sketchmagazine. Greg Harms has done a great job putting this thing together.

This issue:

Gary Barker comes aboard as one of our signature artists, offering tips and tricks and great stuff! If you saw a sample of Gary's art a few issues ago in the ProFolio feature, you have just a taste of what's ahead!

He has some things planned for his next contribution, so I'm looking forward to what's coming. You should, too.

A new feature I'd like to try out is First 3 where we try to show you a quick glimpse of the comics-creating process using just the first three pages, from script to art, whatever we can get to show you that it isn't some big mystery. It's do-able.

Make it count,

MIKE CHOI

interview

by Bill Nichols

If you've seen Mike Choi's work, then you have some idea of just how good the guy is. He started as a background assistant at Top Cow for Mark Silvestri, then moved up to pencil Witchblade and X-23: Target X for Marvel. Sit back, relax and enjoy!

Bill Nichols: How do you like to work, Mike? Do you prefer full script or from a plot?

Mike Choi: I've really only worked with full scripts. Come to think of it, I've really only worked with three writers, two of whom I'm working with now on X-23: Target X, and they all wrote pretty specific scripts. I really like working with full scripts, as I do believe that if someone has the talent to be a good writer, they should do all of the writing. However, I do appreciate some (and in some cases, a lot of) freedom to, while not overtly change anything, add a few things or maybe change a camera angle to maybe further the point of the panel. Nothing that changes the story though. That's a line that shouldn't be crossed. An example would be if the writer describes a panel as being a dynamic profile shot of someone yelling at someone else. I might change that to a more dynamic angle, like maybe something closer to a point-of-view shot. Basically, they might have something specific in mind, but I do love it when the writer trusts me to - if they're asking for something dynamic, for example - surprise them with something that still says what the writer is trying to say, but with hopefully more "punch". I think that decisions like this made on the part of the artist can be part of the added value that a good artist contributes to the project. I don't ever change content though. If the panel describes someone as drinking a cup of coffee, I'm not going to change it to a cool looking glass of iced tea. If they're driving a Hyundai, I'm not going to put them in a Lexus because I think they look better. Tell the story the writer is trying to tell, but try to add to the delivery. I think plots would be almost too much freedom, and there'd be way too much second guessing on my part. And while sometime down the line, I'd love to try working on plots, or even help plot a book myself, right now, I have enough trouble sticking to a deadline as is when I'm being told exactly what to draw!

Bill: Are there any writers you'd like to work with?

Mike: There are writers I'm a huge fan of, but the longer I work and read scripts, the more I realize that there are some writers whose stuff I absolutely love to read, but would hate to draw for. Or even vice versa. I love working with my current collaborators, Craig and Chris. They're able to script really interesting scenarios and action, which are both fun to read and draw, but more importantly, they're not afraid to try and really manipulate the emotions of the reader, and I really like helping them do that, and hopefully do it with some success. Basically anyone who has made me laugh or cry makes me wish I could draw for that person. While I am nowhere near the artistic level of one of my heroes, Frank Quitely, I would really love to try and attempt to do what he does for Grant Morrison, like he did in We3 or All-Star Superman.

Another hero of mine is Tim Sale when he collaborates with Jeph Loeb. Of course, I'd love to do an action-packed Jeph Loeb script because I think it would be fun regardless, but I think the challenge I'd love to face is the one Jeph puts to Tim whenever they work together. I don't think I'm good enough to live up to it yet, but hopefully someday. Maybe someday... I mean, I've really only just gotten started, so I think it's okay for now for me to dream. Another really underrated example (as much publicity as it got) of what I'd love to be given the opportunity to do would be what Brian Michael Bendis did with Olivier Coipel in House Of M. The series was absolutely packed with action, but the two scenes I truly looked at in awe, wishing I could someday pull that off, were the Xavier/Wanda scene in the beginning, as well as the Magneto/Pietro scene, which is absolutely the most important scene in the book, much more than all the action scenes put together, and Olivier absolutely NAILED it. Brian also sets this up for his artists in many of his other books, especially in Daredevil with Alex Maleev, as well as all of his Civil War tie-ins. So I think it really depends on the project as much as the writer him or herself. There are certain projects that Grant, Jeph, Brian or any writer for that matter would write that I would love to do, others I might be slightly less excited for. I think that's how it is for all artists though. We all have stuff we like to draw. But I think the number one guy right now would be Joss Whedon. There's a project that he really wants to do apparently, and it's one I would love to do. I would absolutely do it for free. He's probably the one guy I'd draw for even if the entire script was of two pumpkins in a patch talking to each other. And I hate drawing pumpkins.

Bill: Who inks you the way you'd ink yourself (or imagine that you would) Besides me, of course...

Mike: I have no idea, nor would I really want to ask anyone to ink me, because I don't think it would be very fun, to be honest. My lines are generally dead, so anyone who can add volume to them, I guess, but I don't think that would be as fun as something with a lot of rendering and cross-hatching, of which I do none. I think Dexter Vines does a really great job on Steve McNiven, adding varying volume to his lines, and it looks really good, and everything has really good rhythm. So perhaps him. And of course, you.

Bill: Is there anybody whose inking style so differs from your own that you would just like to see how the styles mesh?

Mike: If we're talking about just curiosity, I think I'd love to see anyone work on my stuff, especially people who have a distinctive penciling style. One of my favorite experiences with an inker was at a convention, when I penciled some Witchblade sketches as the new penciler on the book, with Francis Manapul, the outgoing long-time penciler on the book inking my stuff. It was really cool to see a Manapul-Choi hybrid sketch. I also really like the way Jim Lee inks. Beyond his penciling skills, he's also a really experimental inker, so I'd love to see what he does with something that's pretty empty and open to interpretation like my pencils. Also, I'd do it only to say I've worked with someone like him. Bill Sienkiewicz is also a guy like that. Someone who doesn't ink so much as paint with ink over the pencils, almost using them as a guide or even a suggestion.

Bill: What's your background, Mike? Did you go to art school or are you self-taught?

Mike: I went to college at The University of Texas for a business degree; I think the last art class I took was in junior high. Most of my art education, beyond just looking at other artists and copying what they were doing, or more correctly, what I thought they were doing, came from working at the Top Cow studio. I didn't really start drawing with any kind of aspirations in mind until I was 22, when I started working at IBM, so when I first came into the studio at 25 I was still really green. I had absolutely no skills beyond maybe knowing what I liked to see in a comic book, but that was about it. Most if not all of the skills I have as an artist I learned from Marc Silvestri and the other artists in the pit, like Martin Montiel, Tyler Kirkham, Eric and Rick Basaldua, Joel Gomez, Matt Merhoff and David Nakayama, whether they straight up told me how to do something, or pointed me in the right direction where I could learn by doing it myself. Not only was that experience invaluable as a learning experience, there was a lot of motivation to improve because everybody else around you was getting better with every project and every page.

Bill: What were some of your favorites growing up, Mike? What comics or creators?

Mike: I didn't read a lot of comic books growing up, not until I was in college. I did read the old Marvel G.I. Joe comics as a kid and I liked those a lot, because I loved the cartoon and the toys, and the comics were a great extension of the story. Growing up in Hong Kong, I didn't really get the chance to get into American comics like Spider-man and the X Men until much later. I read comics off and on in high school after I came to the States, but didn't get really into them until college and when I had my first job at IBM and could finally afford comics. When I first started reading comics at this time, I think I only "read" them to look at the pretty pictures, but I think I stayed because I fell in love with the writing. I started really getting into comics and spending a lot of money on trade paperbacks in order to catch up when I discovered the books from the Vertigo line, like Alan Moore's Swamp Thing, Sandman, and Preacher. That's when I literally fell in love with comic books as a storytelling medium. Now I read pretty much everything. I think the rule's basically if it's good I'll give it a legitimate shot, as in I'll read at the very least the first arc. Just because it's good, doesn't mean I'll like it though. That's something that really pisses me off sometimes, is people who automatically say that if they don't like something, it must suck. Sometimes it's just a matter of taste.

Bill: Do you still have mentors/idols in the Biz?

Mike: I think a huge benefit of being a Top Cow alum is the fact that I'm under a pretty big umbrella of creators whose path I've had the good luck to follow in the footsteps of, and those guys have absolutely become my mentors.

I've had the great opportunity to learn from really talented but also really good guys like Marc, Joe Benitez, Billy Tan, Mike Turner, and Dave Finch.

The longer I'm in this industry though, the more I find myself liking artists with wildly different approaches to drawing, most of whom I didn't really have the opportunity to appreciate when I first got into the industry.

These aren't people whose style I generally try to emulate per se, as much as I want to see where they're coming from and then think about the possibility of that perspective as I approach my own stuff, which I think (and hope) really helps me grow as an artist. These are guys like Frank Quitely, Mike Mignola, Bill Sienkiewicz, Ashley Wood, Mike Oeming, Masamune Shirow etc., as well as guys who aren't in the mainstream American comic industry but are really famous like Juan Guardino and Hyung Tae Kim. The only thing I think these guys really have in common is that they're all really, really, really good and totally kick my ass at drawing. Right now a couple guys whose stuff I'm looking at a lot right now are Stuart Immonen and Sean Phillips, and I think stylistically they're about as different as they come, but they both really make a huge contribution to how much I enjoy their books (I just got done reading NextWave and Criminal: Coward, and I really want to be able to do that too. I think that's what every one of the guys I've mentioned do really well.

Bill: What are your favorite things to draw?

Mike: I really like drawing "storytelling" pages. I definitely prefer them to splash pages and covers (although I do like doing them) because I think splash pages and covers are really hard to draw imaginatively and dynamically, at least for me. I think I can do them, but I just don't think that's the area of expertise where I bring the most to the table from what I can offer to a book. I really like doing the pages that tell the writer's story, not just the plot, but the conveyance of emotion that the writer tries to make the reader feel while reading the book. I really like doing that, and the few times someone has come up to me to tell them that I did a good job on that is when I'm most proud of my art, because it's not on a sliding scale - you either succeed or you fail. When I succeed, I think my job as a penciler or artist on the book is done and I can actually feel good about what I've done. I really like the challenge.

Ayla Secura © Lucasfilm Artwork by Mike Choi

Bill: What about least fave?

Mike: Children. It's hard to not make them look like deformed adults. Also it's hard for me to draw ugly. I like doing it, but it's really hard for me. I think I have a tendency to make my pictures look pretty, and sometimes that's good, but sometimes it's definitely bad. Like you can't have a pretty Punisher for example, or for that matter pretty much any grown male character, because then they look really young. You can make them handsome, but not pretty. Captain America is not supposed to be pretty, as I've learned. That's why I like guys like Lee Bermejo and Marko Djurdejevic, for example. They can draw ugly (as well as pretty), but their stuff is always really attractive. Like the girl who isn't particularly pretty, but is really sexy. I have a tendency to draw things pretty, but sometimes forget to make them attractive. So basically, from what I said, it sounds like I would love to draw a book where all of the characters are in high school. Which ISN'T true.

Bill: What tools do you use when you draw? What brands do you favor?

Mike: Lead holder, HB lead, sometimes darker because I don't have an inker. Marvel uses paper that's thinner than Image paper, and I've gotten used to it and now actually prefer it. I like feeling the table underneath it. If it's something that doesn't have to look a certain way, like commissions or sketches, I use pretty much anything I can get my hands on (and sometimes even my hands). I like working with ink, because I'm not very comfortable doing tonal stuff. I like things being black or white, and prefer rendering grays in black and white as well. And I LOVE Blue Line products! All of them!

Bill: What the easiest thing about all this and what's the hardest?

Mike: I think the easiest thing is motivating myself to want to get better because the industry is so good and everyone gets better. To stick, you really have to establish yourself as the top 0.000001% of everyone who's ever picked up a pencil. People get better with mileage, and people draw because they love to draw.

Getting excited to work is also easy. I love comic books. I'm a fan and always will be, even as I become a "real" comic book artist and my heroes accept me as a peer (which I still can't take seriously when they say so), I will always be a fan. I'll be standing in line for sketches at cons hopefully when I'm a gnarled veteran.

The hardest thing is probably maintaining a good daily schedule, and I'm not talking about work. I finished X-23 a couple weeks ago and my sleep schedule is still crazy, in that I'll stay up for 30 hours then sleep for 13 for days on end. Sometimes that can wreck havoc on your life, health wise, and socially.

When I was a consultant you couldn't wait to get to your life after work. When you're in comics, it takes an active effort to make a life for yourself outside of work, and sometimes you forget.

While it's easy to get motivated to work, sometimes getting motivated to draw itself is difficult. I love reading scripts, looking up refs, doing sketches etc., but staring at a blank page can be pretty daunting at times. Sometimes it'll be midnight before I realize I've been "working" the entire day but haven't touched the page yet. Pressure to do your best work sometimes leads to procrastination. Plus I've just discovered Facebook.

Bill: From the sketch stages to the pencils, a few things change, characters are added, #### etc., what's the process of creating comics like for you?

Mike: I think something that's a little weird is that I haven't submitted layouts for approval in a while now with either Top Cow or Marvel. Hopefully I can take that to mean that the editors trust me in at least my storytelling abilities, because I think layouts are supposed to help editors identify problems with the storytelling before the final work is done. So basically the editors sometimes don't see anything until the penciling's finished.

After drawing it, I work really closely with Sonia Oback (the color artist on everything I do) in finishing it, because sometimes I leave everything so open with no lighting and I need to show Sonia what I want for the finished image. 9 times out of 10 though she does something that's so incredible and I'd never even imagined it. Photoshop is amazing nowadays. It's not a crutch, but it's a hell of a useful tool that can make things a lot easier, like the pencil sharpener. If changes need to be made to pages because of editorial decisions, Sonia and I work together to try and fix that, and we almost always do it in Photoshop. I've never had to do it on comic book pages though... I imagine it'd be a little more complicated.

Bill: Do you get feedback from anyone else, like your editor or the writer? Or is it all just you?

Mike: I get feedback from pretty much everyone who has anything to do with the book, and everyone I show it to, like other artists. The people whose opinion I listen to most are probably Sonia as the co-artist, the writers because they're whose vision we're trying to recreate, and then the editors.

That's not order of importance, just the order of how the process usually goes for me. I do go online a lot and listen to fans. I understand that you can't please everyone, but they're usually quickest to tell you any glaring mistakes you might have because they don't care about your feelings. Also, it pays to lend them your ears because ultimately they're the ones who are going to be buying the stuff and determining whether or not you're - in the end commercial art is successful or not.

Bill: Do you see the end result in your mind's-eye? Or does the page take on its own life and tell YOU what it should look like...?

Mike: A little bit of both. You don't want to improvise too much because you want to stay true to the story, and I do believe that there are only a very few ways to tell any story effectively. I can't remember who said it, but a film director said something along the lines of there being only two ways to shoot a scene, and one of them is wrong. Rarely do things take on their own life, but sometimes happy accidents do happen. Most of the time it's Sonia's colors doing something I'd never expected, but it never does anything outright contradicting what I expected. I definitely think I am the one who determines what at least my side of the art will look like, almost from the very beginning. Maybe with more experience that will change.

Bill: What is something about yourself that you would like to share with the readers of Sketch?

Mike: I didn't start this career until very late and I do believe if I can do it, anyone can do it if they really want it. But they have to really want it. It's probably the most difficult thing I've ever had to do in my entire life, but it's by far also the most rewarding.

To do great work in comics you have to be a great team player, and to do that, the most important rule is to treat your collaborators the way you want to be treated yourself.

TEAMWORK

The Universe at Your Finger Tips

Thoughts on Scripting Comic Books

by Tom Bierbaum

No writer in this business does it on his or her own. If you're ever lucky enough to be the writer of a great comic book, it's because you teamed up with some great collaborators. So most of us have little chance of ever being a great comic-book writer if we don't learn to be a great team player.

My wife and I have had the honor of working with a lot of truly great professionals. For example, we consider our roughly three years putting out DC's Legion of Super Heroes together with Keith Giffen, Al Gordon, Jason Pearson, Tom McCraw and letterers that included John Workman and Todd Klein to be a golden time where we were honored to be on a true all-star team that was as good as any in the business. I hope our experience on that team and in collaboration with many other great professionals helped us to understand what it takes to be an important part of a great team.

For what it's worth, here are a few things I think I learned.

1.) Respect.

It's easy to defer to the big names that you may be lucky enough to work with, but respect everyone you work with, no matter how new and unknown. Whoever it is, they've spent a lot of energy studying their craft and are going to bring something unique to your collaboration. Don't resist the fact that they see comics differently than you, embrace it and take the unique perspectives of everyone on the team and combine them into a product than nobody else could have created.

2.) Be Yourself.

By the same token, hold onto your unique perspective and provide something to the collaboration that your teammates can't duplicate and that no other writer can offer. Don't let the accomplishments of your collaborator intimidate you into being a yes man, because great collaborations don't work that way.

3.) Understand Your Position.

At the same time, let the stature and the accomplishments of the various members of the team determine whose voices carry the most weight. Don't let some rookie make you abandon what you think is right and don't expect an industry legend to let you talk them out of what they think is right.

4.) Command Respect, Don't Demand It.

I remember telling an aspiring artist who was displaying quite a fiery ego that the best way to get respect in this business is to give it. If you enter a collaboration determined to assert your point of view and to aggressively criticize your teammates when you don't think they're measuring up (as this aspiring artist seemed determined to do), you're probably going to get that same kind of disrespect back from your collaborators.

By the same token, if the way you deal with your teammates is to embrace their ideas and celebrate their artistry while at the same time advancing your own creative input with confidence, you have the best chance of eliciting that same kind of treatment from your collaborators.

5.) Remember That You're One of Them.

There will be times when you'll get fed up with how a lot of people in this business can seem so egotistical, so stubborn and argumentative, so sure their way is the only way, so nakedly ambitious, such control freaks, so in love with the sound of their own voices and their own opinions... And when you don't think you can take it anymore, go take a look in the mirror and admit that you're one of them.

One of the reasons other creators can so rub you the wrong way is that, deep down, they're so much like you.

It sure doesn't seem that way. When they insist on doing things their way, they're being egotistical and stubborn. When you insist on doing things your way, it's because you're right and the project will be better off if your artistic vision prevails.

But if you want to be a great teammate, you've got to accept that you probably come off to other creators pretty much the way other creators come off to you.

6.) Don't Hold It Against Them

Or yourself. This is the way creative people are. This is what's demanded of people who chase their dreams in a business that can't support nearly all the dreamers who want to participate. This is reality in a business where nice guys are lucky if they finish last because most of them never get a chance to even start the race.

If you want to work with a bunch of genuinely selfless, sacrificing, humble people, become a nurse or a teacher or a fireman, because the comic book business isn't looking for that particular skill set.

7.) Just Because You Are That Way Doesn't Mean You Have to Act That Way.

I know many, many very successful pros who nobody would ever think of in the terms I've been describing. Whatever ego is inside them, urging them on, is kept very effectively in check. My belief is that it's in there somewhere, making up an important part of that creator's muse, but they're intelligent enough to know they'll ultimately have a lot more success and be happier people if they use that ego to spur them on but rein it in any time it can start to be a hindrance.

If you're smart, use whatever unique brain chemistry you were born with - positive and negative - to your advantage. If you've got a huge ego, use that ego privately to spur you on and demand the very best of yourself, and then exercise the self discipline it takes to shut off that ego when it wants to start expressing itself publicly and destructively.

8.) Consciously Build the Right Skills

You can pride yourself on being a tough guy who gets his way and doesn't take nothin' from nobody. Or you can pride yourself on being someone who gets along with people, turns negatives into positives and brings out the best in his teammates. It's your choice and it's pretty clear which one will help you excel as a collaborator.

There's a time and a place to be tough and assertive, but pick your fights carefully. Take care in identifying who's actually an enemy and take special care not to create enemies through your own actions. You just don't need the distractions and hurdles these conflicts can pose. And the last thing you want to do is turn somebody you have to work with every day into an enemy.

9.) Be Loyal.

You're in this together. Stick up for your teammates and watch their backs. It can be a ruthless business, fans can be vicious and there's always somebody looking to get something from a successful pro, so show some loyalty. In a way, your team is a family and you should show your collaborators the kind of loyalty you'd show a family member.

This can get really complicated. If the editor lets you know he's going to fire a teammate but says you can't tell him, you're in a bind, because that's very important information for your colleague. I don't have an answer to this dilemma, but I know there are people who think you absolutely must tell that teammate what's in store. My feeling is, in that case, you'd need to force the issue with the editor so you're not betraying his trust and endangering your own position.

But either way, good teammates look out for each other. If you want the team to be great, you've got to put some exceptional commitment behind it and that means going the extra mile for your collaborators.

10.) Remember Who the Competition Is.

You should be encouraging and energizing your teammates, not competing with them to see who can get the control or the most credit. Your competition is every other comic your reader could be reading and every other video game your reader could be playing and anything else your reader could be doing rather than buying and reading your comic. You can't afford to put out the second-best comic your team is capable of and if you're fighting against the team instead of fighting for it, that's exactly what you'll be putting out.

Give your collaborators support, fellowship and encouragement so they do their best work when they work with you. When the time comes that you have to be critical, do to them what you wish they'd do to you when you're the one that needs to hear that kind of negative feedback. Make sure they get the correction they need in a way that uplifts them and propels them to higher achievement, rather than discouraged and diminished as a creator.

11.) Ask Not What They Can Do For You But What You Can Do for Them.

One of the dynamics of collaboration is that this is where contacts come from, so there's the unstated subtext to the relationship that the teammates will be in a position to do each other favors in the future.

As discussed in my column in making contacts in Sketch #28, you'd better not come off as if you're looking to cash in on your relationships. Concentrate on being a valued contact for your collaborators and you greatly enhance the chances that they'll want to treat you the same way.

12.) Listen.

To be a great team player, you need to make everyone glad they're working with you. And you can't do that if you're always guessing and assuming what they might want out of you. Listen to their directions and requests. Ask them what they want. Get to really know them and what makes them tick.

It's easy to project your own preferences and values onto other people, or convince yourself that what you want to do is what other people want you to do.

Creative people can be a bit on the self-absorbed side, but to be a great team player, you really have to build up a different set of muscles the ability to focus on other people and truly figure out what you can do to make their professional lives easier and more successful.

13.) Remember What Matters.

It doesn't matter whose idea gets used and it doesn't matter who gets the credit. What matters is that the best idea gets used and that you don't waste any unnecessary time or energy determining what that best idea is.

If you want to be an amateur, obsess about every detail and agonize and fight till you get your way on every point.

If you want to be a pro, solve creative issues by exploring lots of great ideas from all sources and settling on the right solution as quickly as you can so you can move on to the next creative issue. You're a pro and that means coming up with great answers to tough creative dilemmas in a short amount of time and then moving on to the next issue. And you do that by shrewdly evaluating ideas no matter who they come from - don't fall in love with your own suggestions and waste everyone's time trying to sell them something they're not buying. Identify and champion what's truly the right answer whether it came from you or anyone else.

14.) Be Generous.

As much as I've encouraged you not to worry about credit and ego, give your teammates all the support, credit and ego-boost you can. You yourself shouldn't be obsessing about such things, but that doesn't mean most creative people you work with don't thrive on positive feedback and won't end up doing better work if you give it to them.

Yes, sometimes it'll be a one-way street and your kindness won't be reciprocated. Don't worry about it. Things have a tendency to even out over time and behaving like a pro generally rewards itself over time.

That, as much as anything, is what being a good team player is all about. Deal with collaborators the way you want to be dealt with. Writers can't do it alone in this business, so the way to get great work out of your collaborators is to give them the kind of support you yourself need to do great work.

ART SCHOOL NOT-SO-CONFIDENTIAL

by Gary Barker

First, a big thanks to Bob Hickey and Bill Nichols for giving me the opportunity to write something for Sketch Magazine. When Bill first asked me to do this feature, I was, needless to say, hesitant. This magazine has done an excellent job of giving technical advice, tips and lessons through Mitch Byrd. Not to mention all the other books, magazines and such that also cover comic art production. I was stressing over how to start my first feature and then it dawned on me...

This year, The Ringling College of Art and Design offered its first comic art class, called Comix, taught by Joe Thiel. All of the students taking this course were 3rd year students, already having taken the prerequisite Graphic Novel Writing.

by Dustin d'Arnault

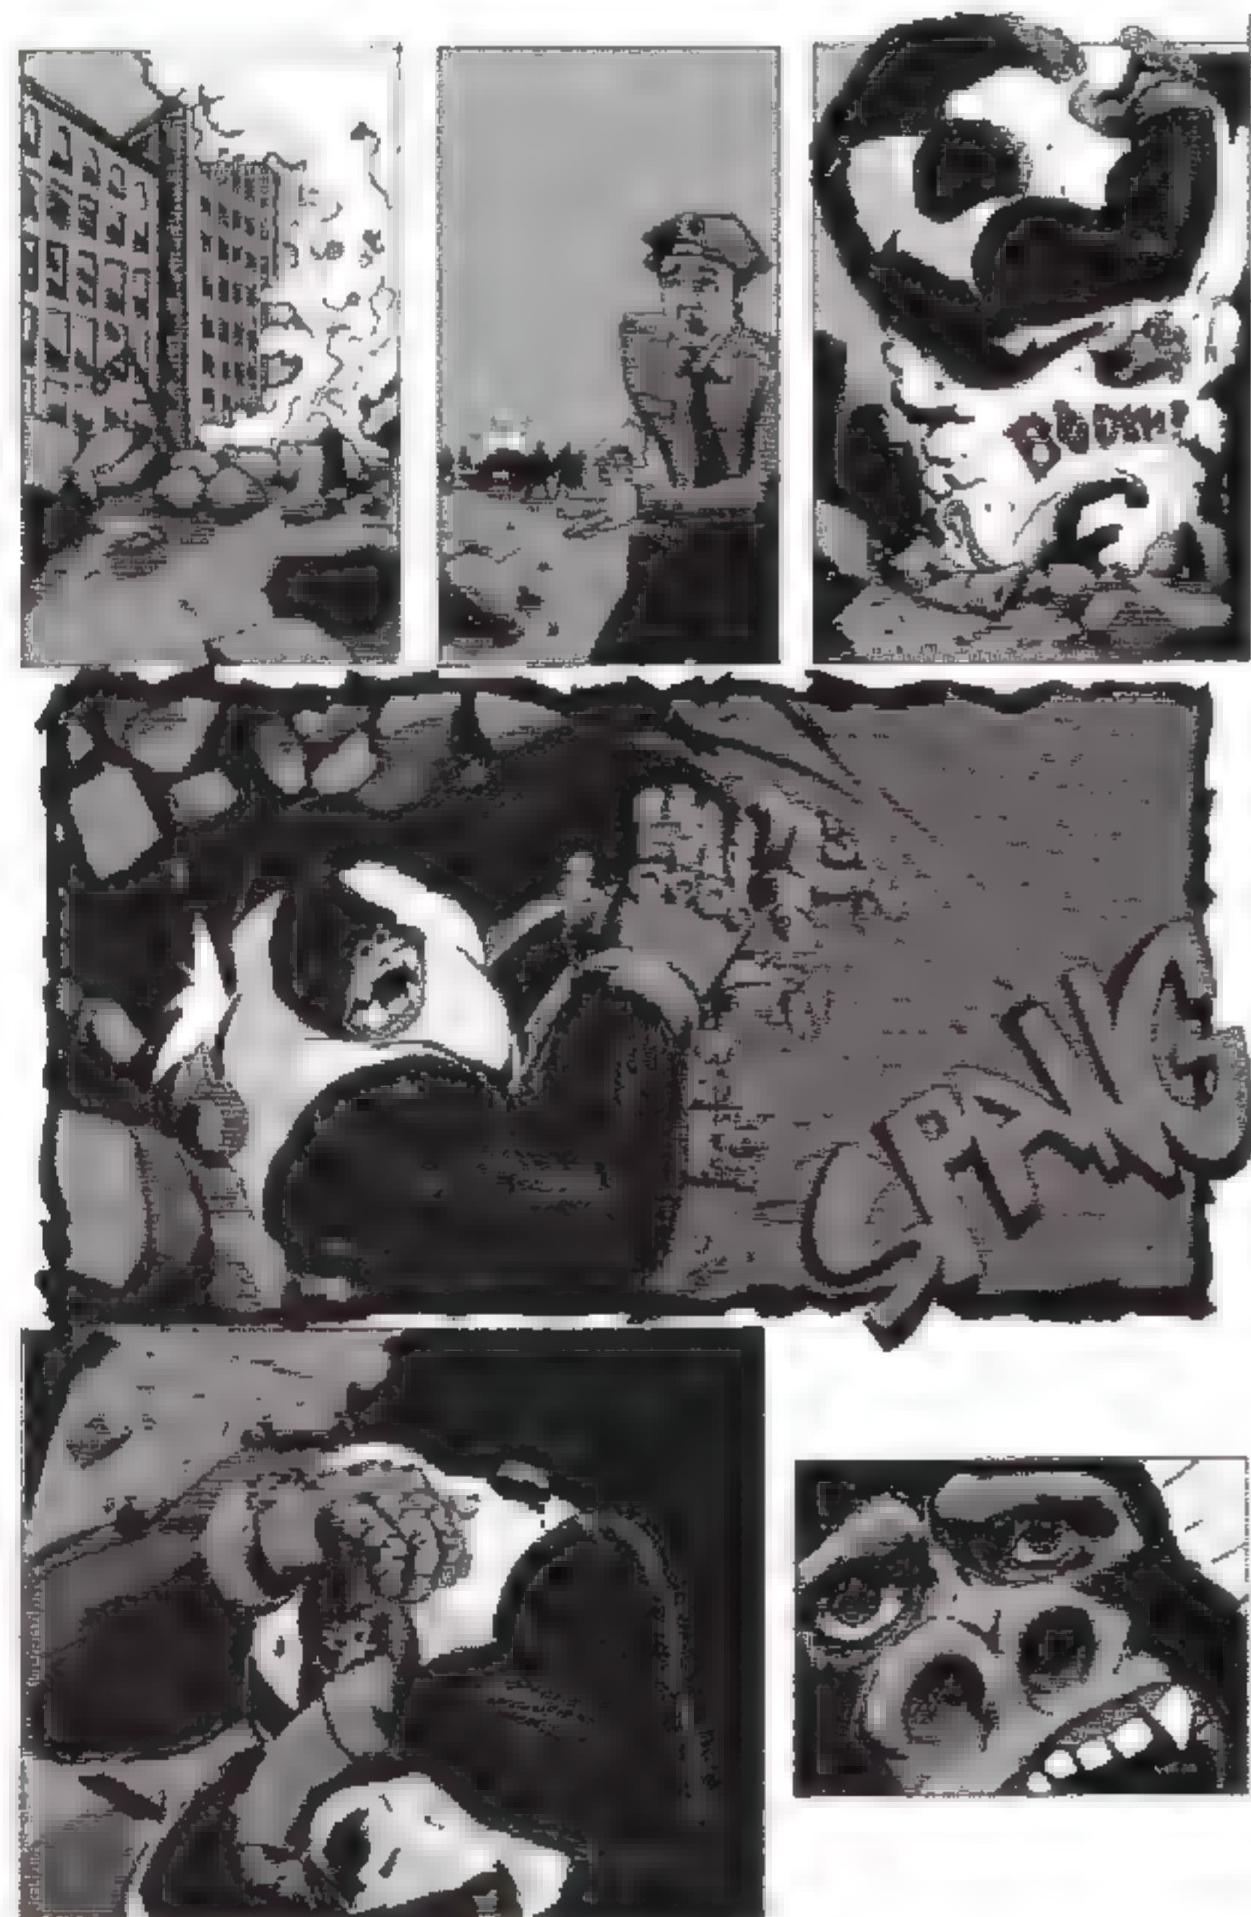

The students were to create a series of comic pages. The results were not only impressive but interesting; not one student did a super hero theme. When I questioned them about this, their response was that while many first discovered the medium through the spandex and cape comics, most wanted to pursue other genres. Also the influences of digital games, graphic novels, manga and the internet are changing the parameters of possibilities. I think this is a good thing for the future of the industry.

For the Comix class, the students were given the assignment to write and draw a series of sequential pages on pretty much any concept. Concept is everything. This is where the idea begins in its rawest form. Sketching out ideas and breaking down pages very roughly, while paying close attention to the most important aspect of comics...storytelling. Once done, these rough pages are placed on the wall and critiqued by not just the instructor but also the other students. Everything is discussed in what works and what doesn't work. Not for the thinned-skinned, as these critiques can be a bit rough, but the feedback is invaluable.

Here are examples from three of the students in the class:

by Dustin d'Arnault

Dustin d'Arnault went with a giant monsters theme. Notice the diagonal direction in his panels/pages. Giving your panels a diagonal direction helps create motion and drama. The use of horizontal and vertical direction can be used to slow the pace of the story and/or create stability.

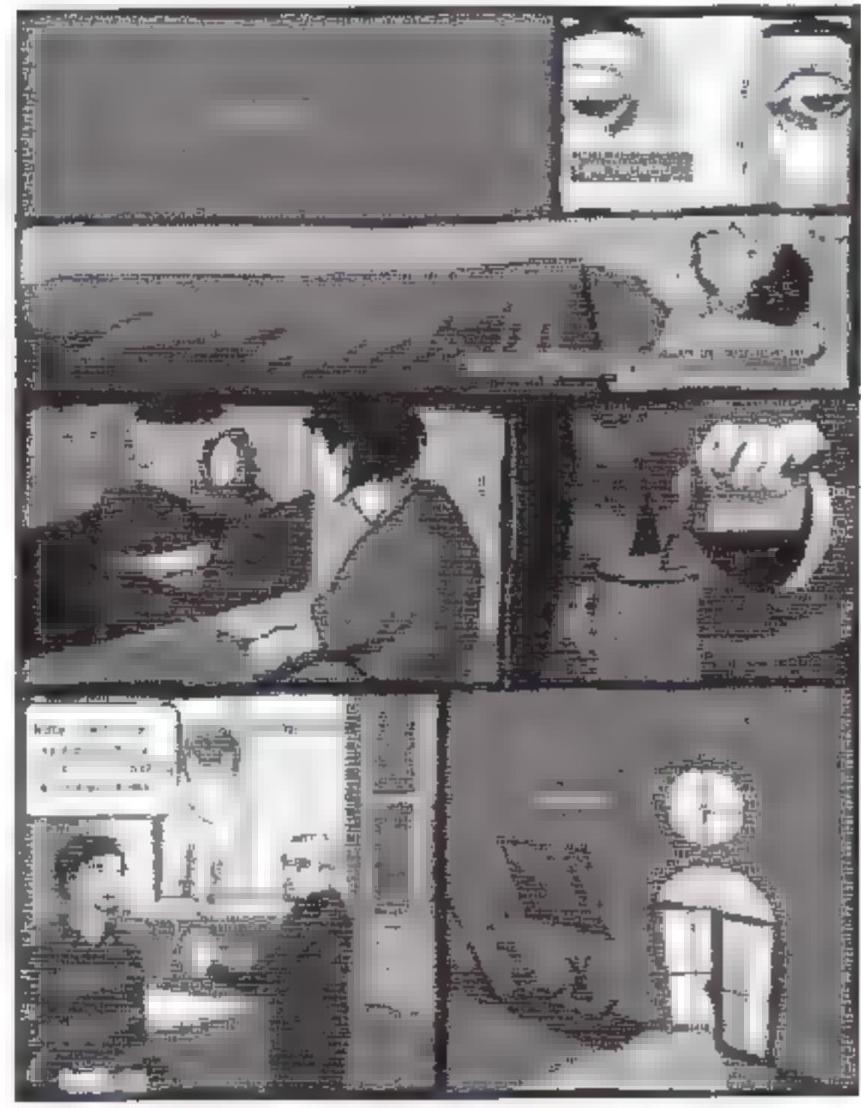

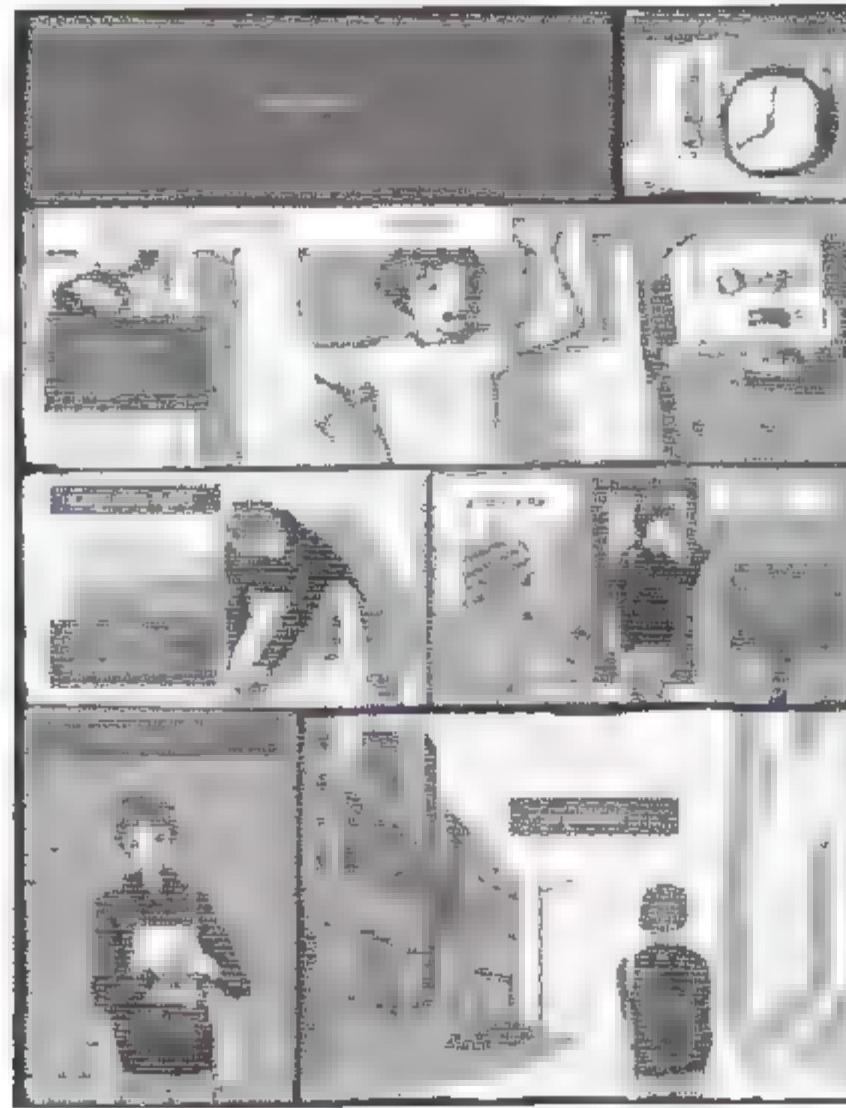

by Adam Volker

Adam Volker uses contrast and shapes to lead the reader's eye around the page. When creating pages think about your light source(s). The direction of light can establish the mood or atmosphere. Spotting blacks and silhouettes can add a great deal of visual interest and impact to your story.

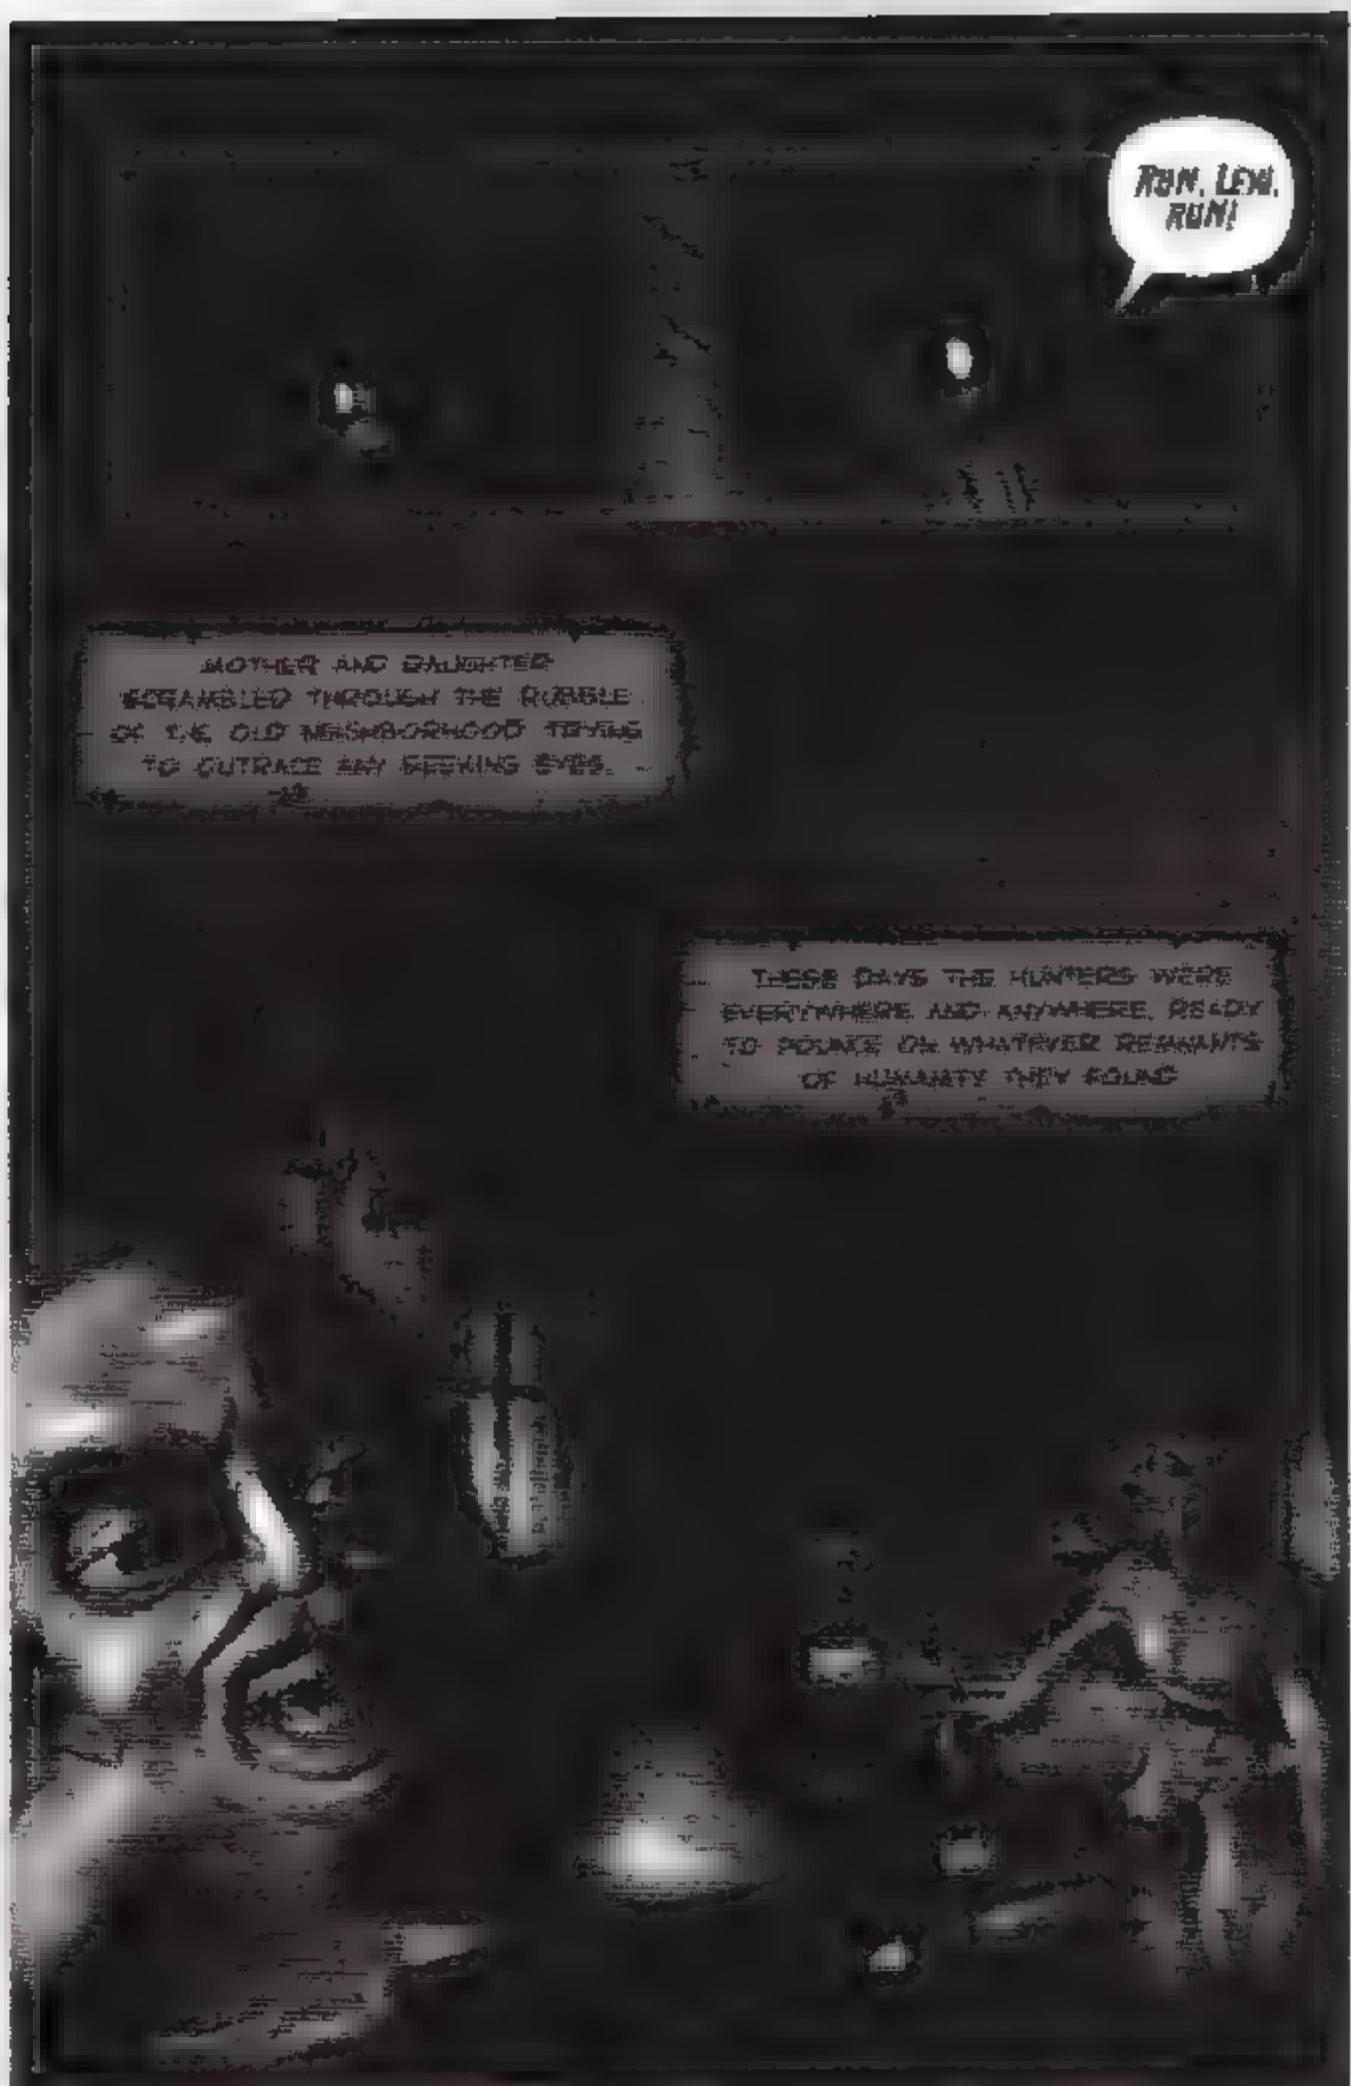

by Erin McGuire

Erin McGuire introduces her characters in a panel arrangement that relates her pages and her characters. Erin establishes a rhythm through camera angles, lighting and horizontal direction. Notice the little "real life" moments that help us as the reader identify with the situations depicted.

For future features, I would be very interested to know what subjects you would like to have me illustrate. You can contact me with your requests at my website: www.garybarker.com
Until next issue,

Gary Barker

COPIC MARKERS, AIR MARKERS, TONES, REFILLS

COPIC Markers have been widely used in Europe and Asia where their coloring qualities go hand in hand with the style we know as manga. Their versatility and variety lends itself to the imagination of the creator and gives him or her options for their creative style. The standard square designed COPIC marker is double-ended and fast drying. COPICS have been specially formulated with a toner designed not to dissolve making them able to work directly onto photocopied surfaces and provide clear unblended color. One of the best parts about COPIC markers is their refillable ink and replaceable nib features.

Carving a Legend: Sculpting Wolverine

by Rudy Garcia

The subject for this article is the Wolverine Icon Bust by Diamond Select Toys. This will include a detailed description of the entire process from concept drawing to finished art.

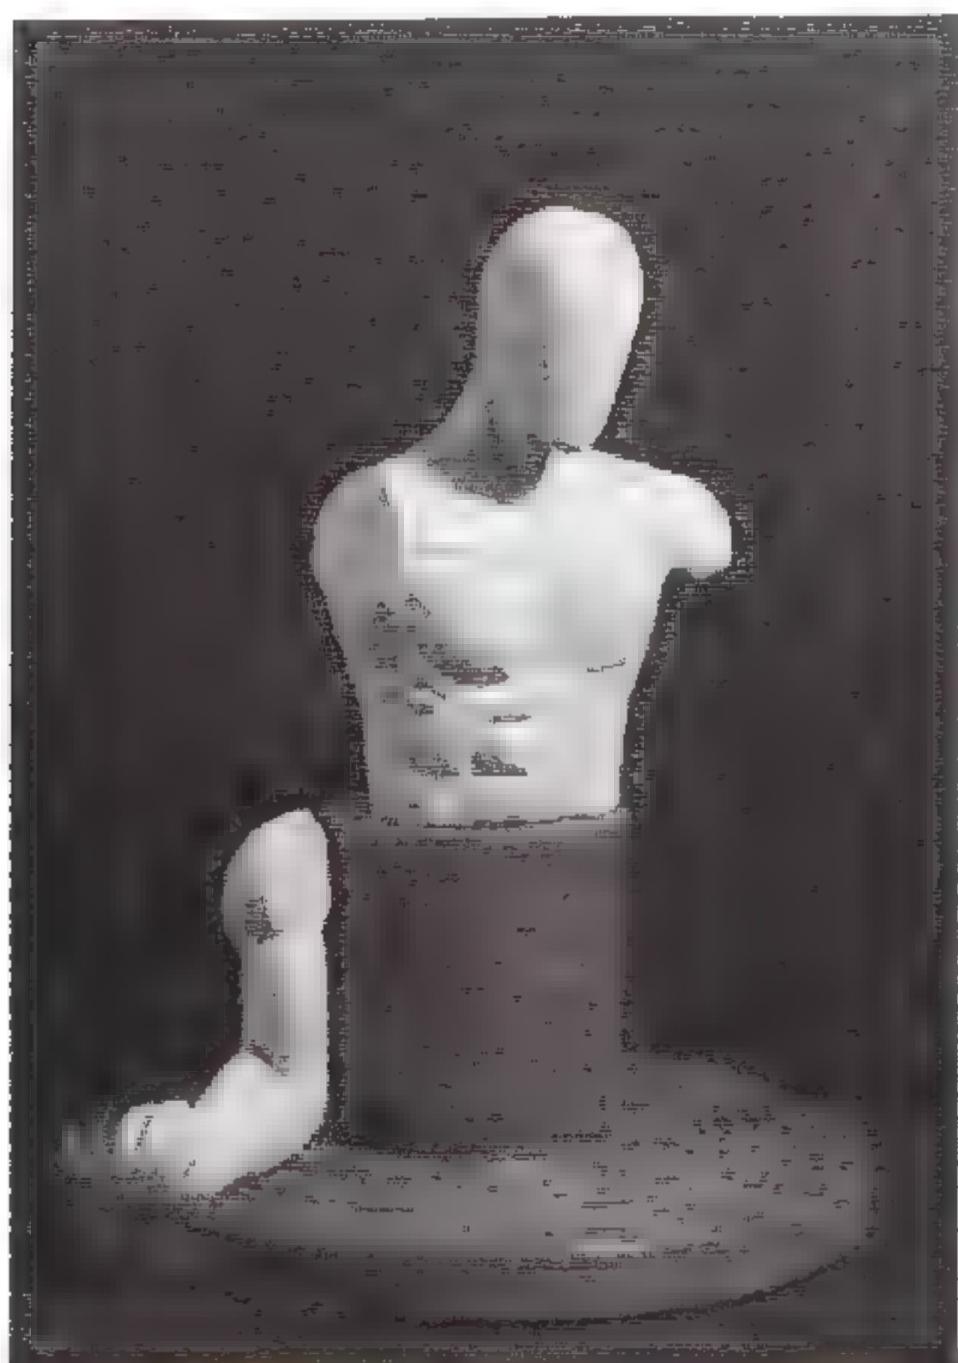

The first step in creating a licensed character, in this case for Marvel Comics, is to gather a great deal of reference, both comic and realistic. For this particular bust, the concept drawing or control art was supplied by Art Asylum. Since the control art I received consisted of front, side and back views of the character, I only had to compile the "realistic" photo reference. I use muscle magazines found at local bookstores as my photo reference. Once I post the reference material in clear view of my work area, it's time to get to work.

To begin, I roll out a ball that I will use for the head. Next, I make a rectangle with a slight taper on one end to use as the body. The arm is basically a worm shape that I attach to the body with a waxing pen. I use a sculpting compound called Castilene, which is a wax, and Plastilina based clay. I use the microwave to heat the clay to allow it to become very pliable and easy to shape. Once the Castilene cools it will harden.

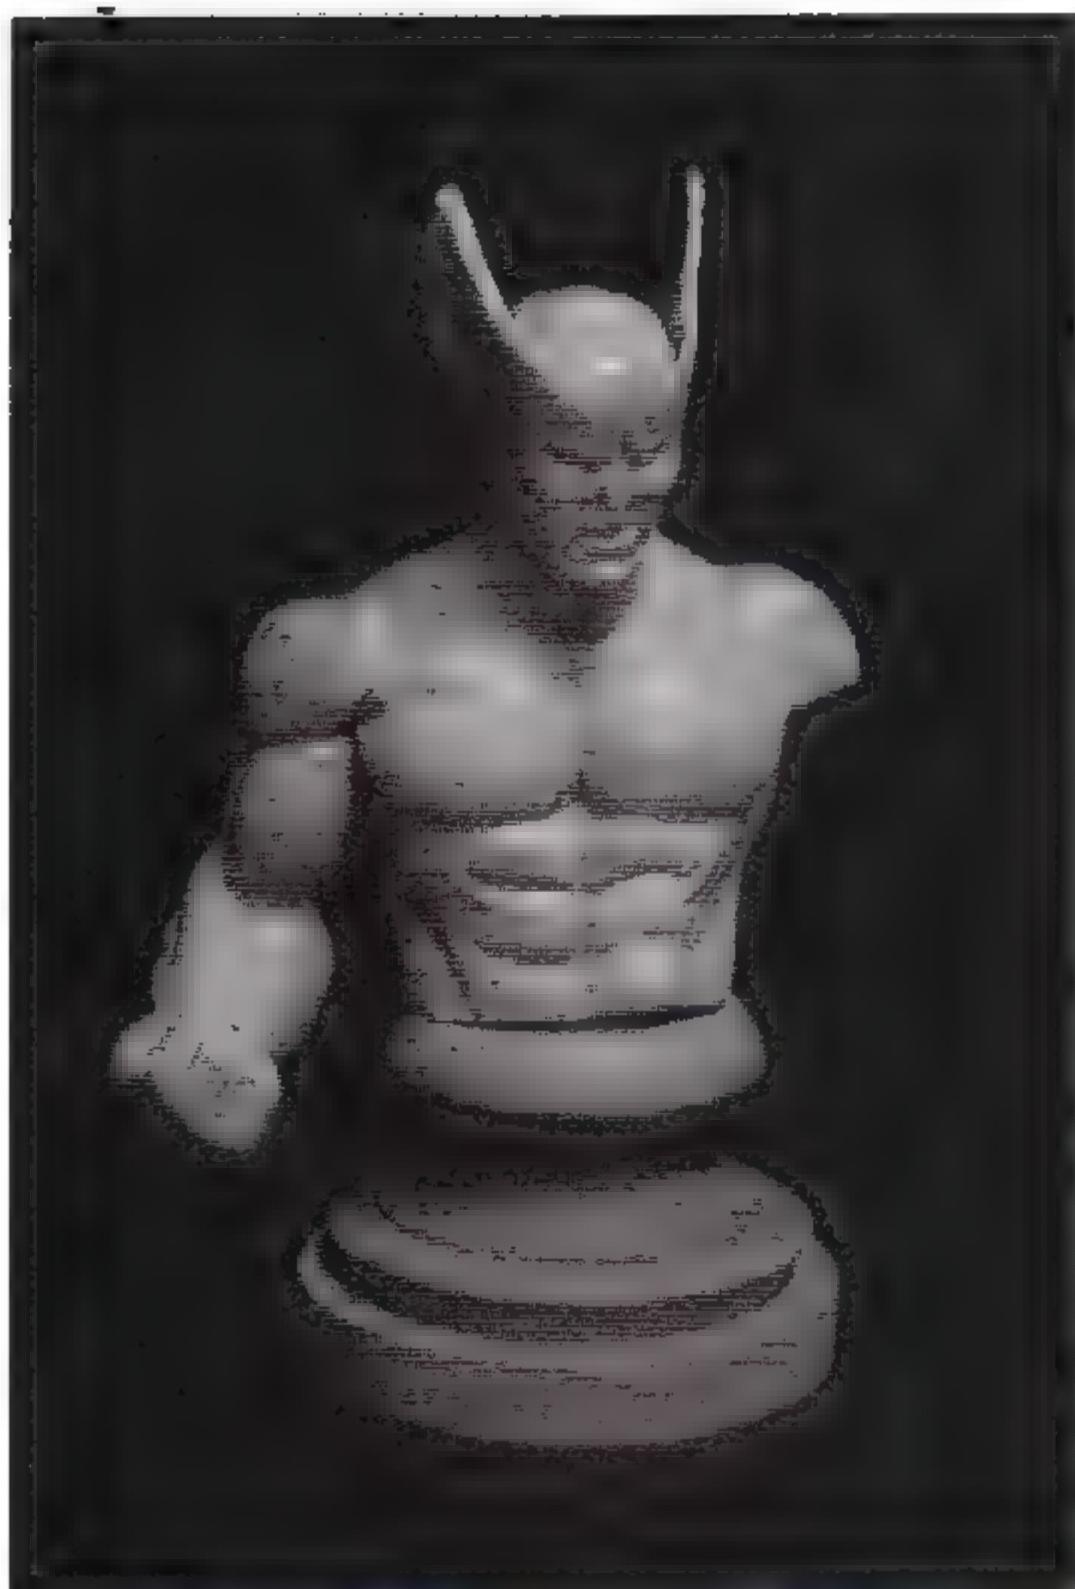

As I move along in the "rough out" stage, I introduce a series of tools to the clay, such as half inch X-Acto chisels, dental tools and sandpaper to get the figure "blocked out." Using the realistic photo reference from the muscle magazine, I apply the muscles loosely in their designated groups over the blocked out form. This will give you a chance to add or subtract mass if necessary. During this stage it is very helpful to check your progress by holding your sculpture upside down; this will point out any asymmetry in the form.

At this point, I cut the arm off at the shoulder for molding purposes. I also fit the joint with a square peg for strength and registration in production. I find it easier to cut the arm off in the initial rough out stage as opposed to cutting the finished piece apart and compromising some of the fine detail.

It doesn't take long for the character to take shape as one muscle group flows into another; this is the detailing part of the process. Paying close attention to muscle detail, I take a pen torch and very lightly melt the muscles into one another, making sure that I don't hold the torch on one spot for too long as that will surely turn the muscle mass into liquid. Instead, I move the torch in a circular motion or back and forth. After allowing this area to cool for about a minute, I go back with my heated "golf putter" dental tool and slightly feather the muscles.

After checking the symmetry to my satisfaction, I take superfine sandpaper and carefully take down any rough or irregular spots on the sculpture. I then move onto the ultra fine detailing which includes the vascular detail of the muscles, facial features, skin texture and costume detailing.

Upon final inspection of my sculpture, I notice that there are a few areas that need a small amount of smoothing out. Since I cannot use a torch due to the delicate area I use a brush and lighter fluid. This enables me to "clean up" small areas of the face and tiny crevices in the muscle cuts. I also brush over the entire sculpture with a small amount of lighter fluid to give it a final cleaning and to decrease the amount of "shine" on the sculpture. I use the lighter fluid sparingly as using too much can turn the clay slightly gritty.

The base of the sculpture is made from a material called Renshape. It comes in different densities and is great for lathe turning, sanding and drilling. A local artist who "turned" the base on a lathe created the base for this sculpture.

I join the base to the torso and the piece is now complete. I submit photos to Diamond Select Toys for final approval of the sculpture.

Digital Art Tutorials Review

Backgrounds, Scenes and Skies vol. 1

by Robert Wayne Hickey

This video from Brian Haberlin and his Haberlin Studios covers creating Backgrounds, Scenes and Skies is a great addition to your reference library. As in the past the video has many details and how to in using the digital medium in creating great comics and artwork. The disk also includes many extras such as sample artwork, brushes, color swatches and manual.

Brian describes in terms that "anyone" can understand about using photoshop and it's tools in creating great visual artwork.

Designing a Pinup: Ultimate Thor

by Jason Baroody

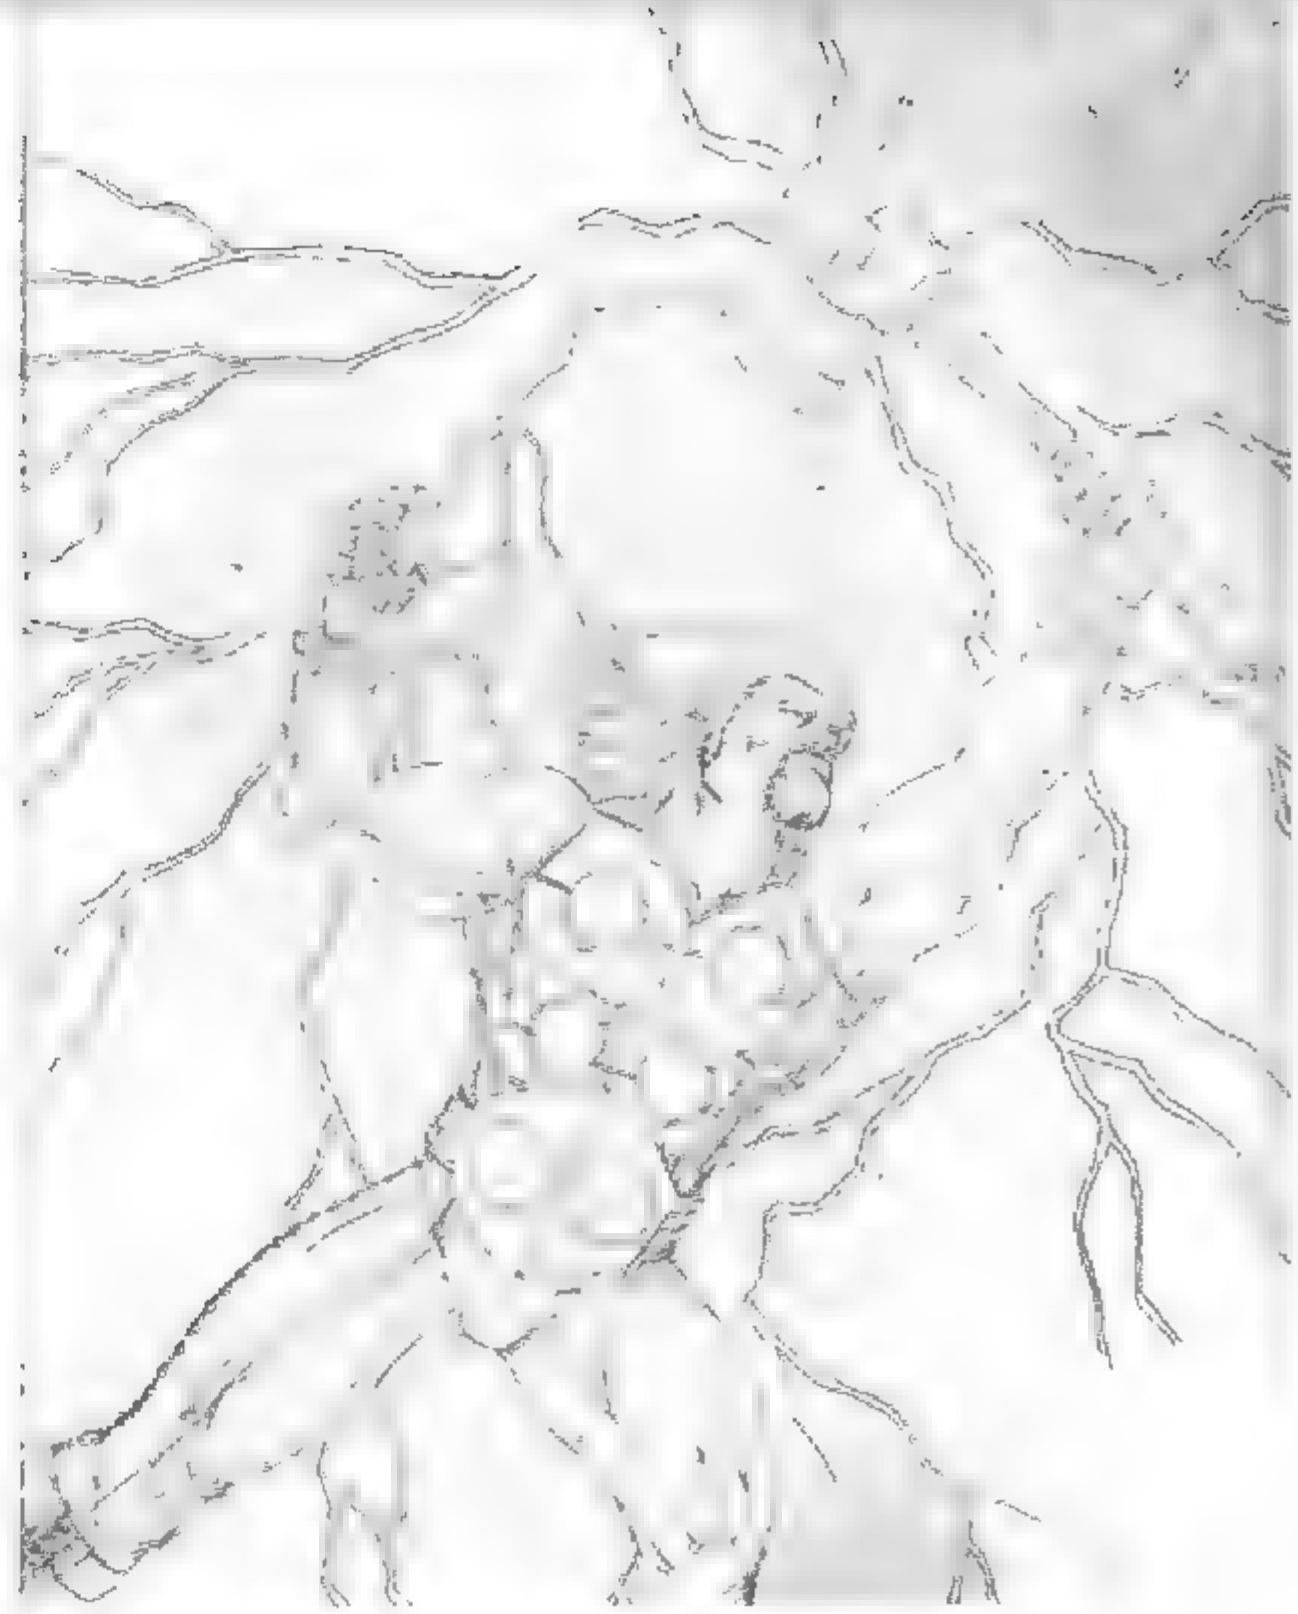

First off, I start with an outline of the main image. I want a feel for what the focus will be, even if it changes later on in the picture. I'm using a Faber-Castell 3H pencil. I find it holds a good point, and the lines erase easily for me.

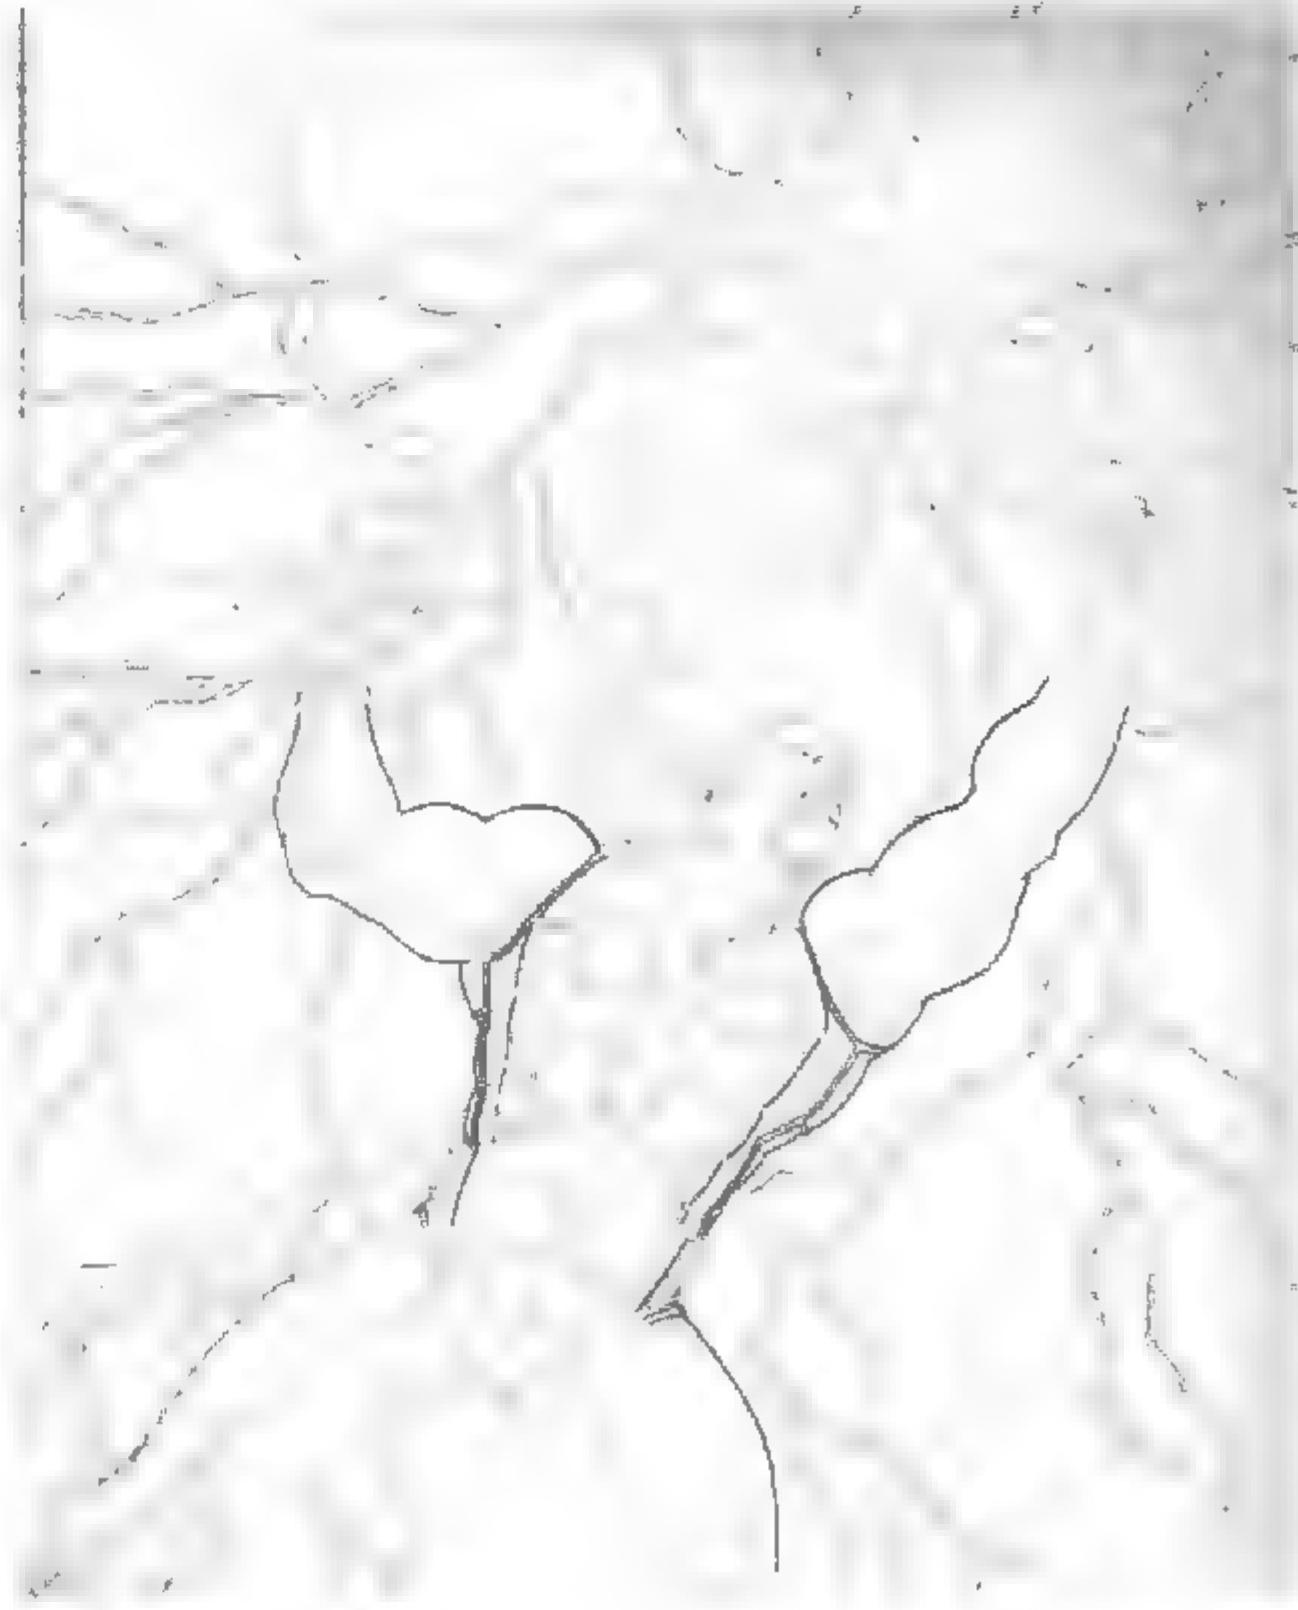

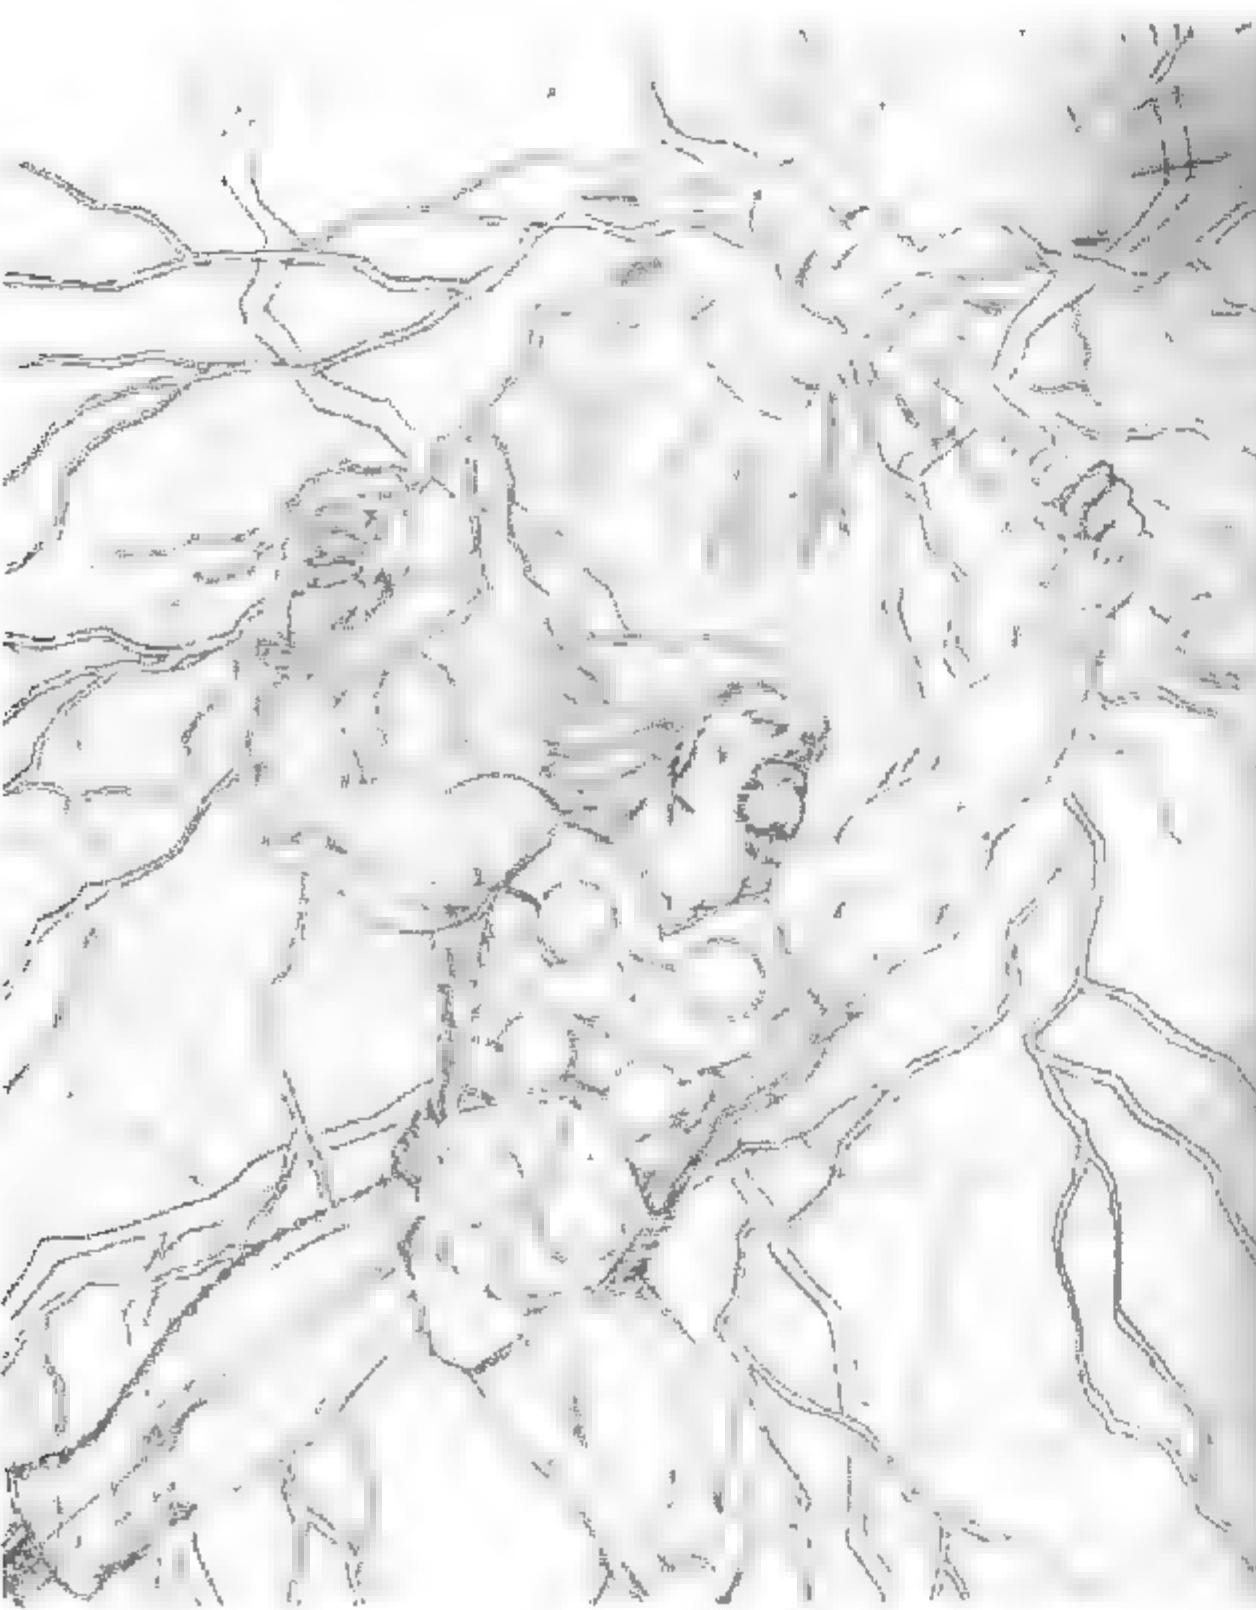

Now, I begin to add some details to the picture. I haven't drawn the face yet. A lot of people draw faces first. I usually save them for last.

Here I've added most of the figures details and worked out most of the image. Since I'm inking it later, I don't fill in the black areas. There's no need to since I know where they will go.

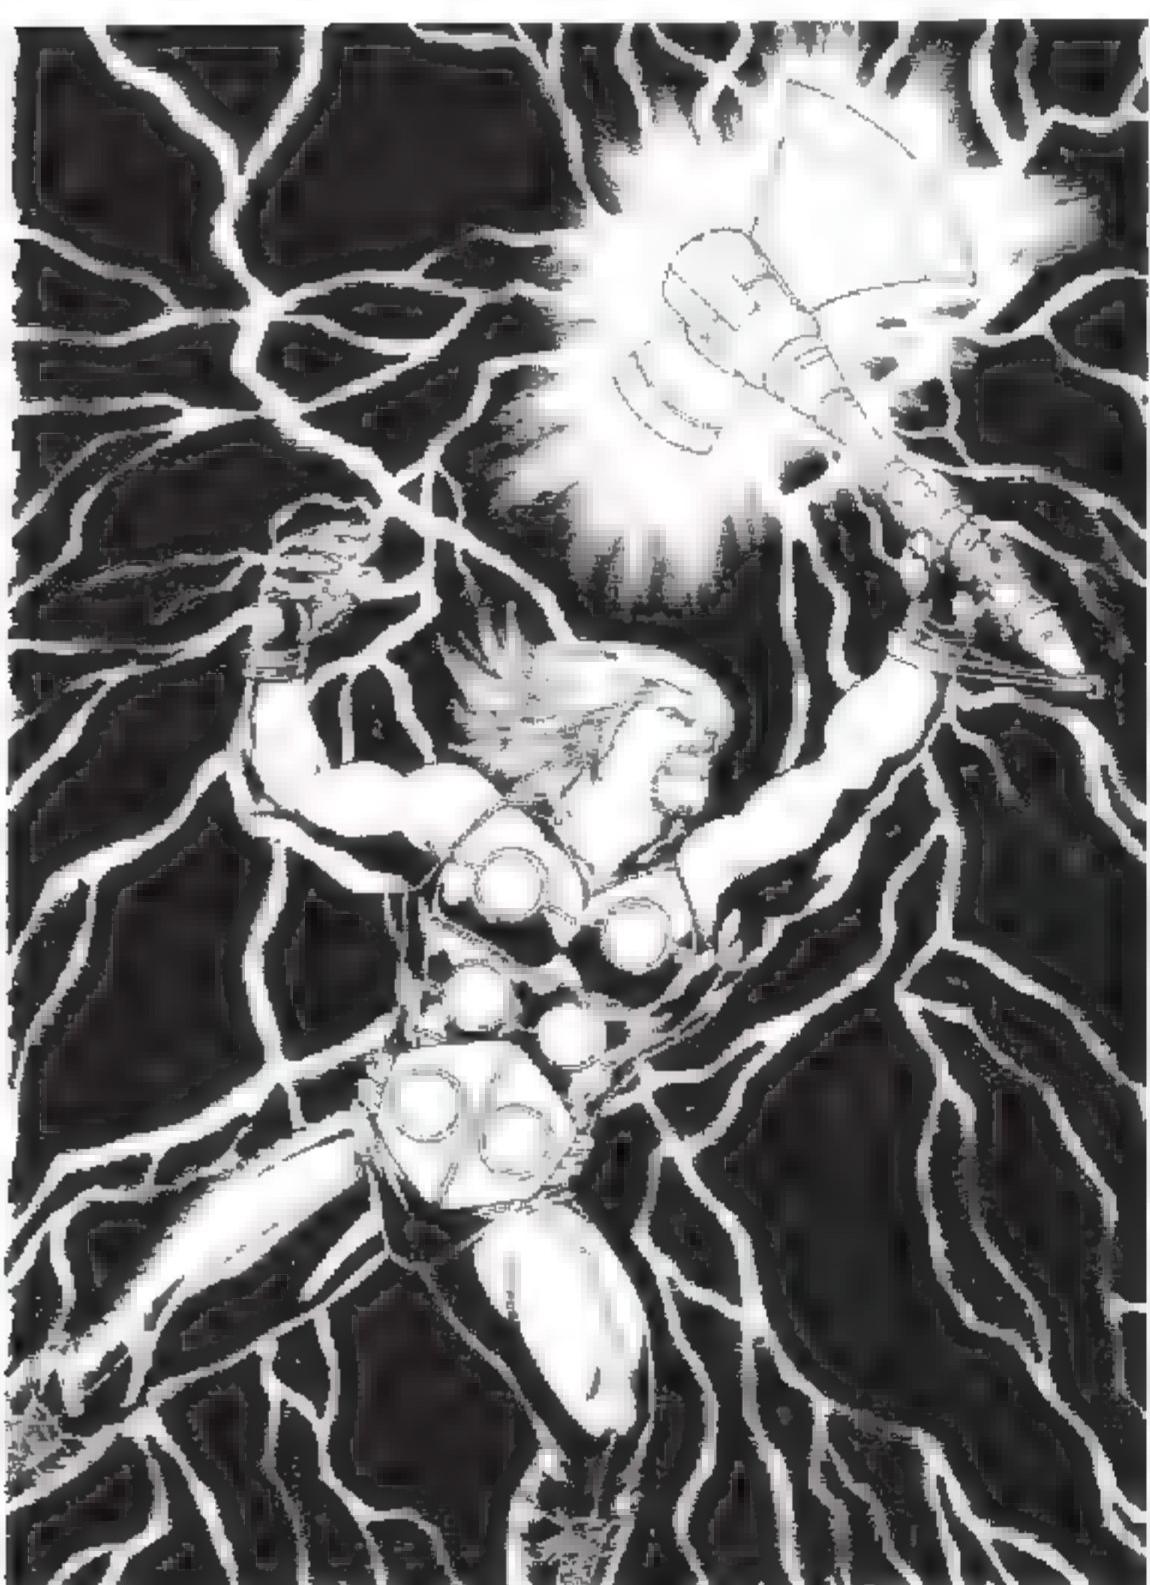

The background image in this case will be lots of lighting strikes. At this point, the pencils are done.

Now for the inks. Much like the pencils, I will start inking the outline first and work my way in. I'm using Microns and Sharpies. I'm not an inker, so it's what I use.

Once the main figure is inked, I look it over and search for any corrections I want to make.

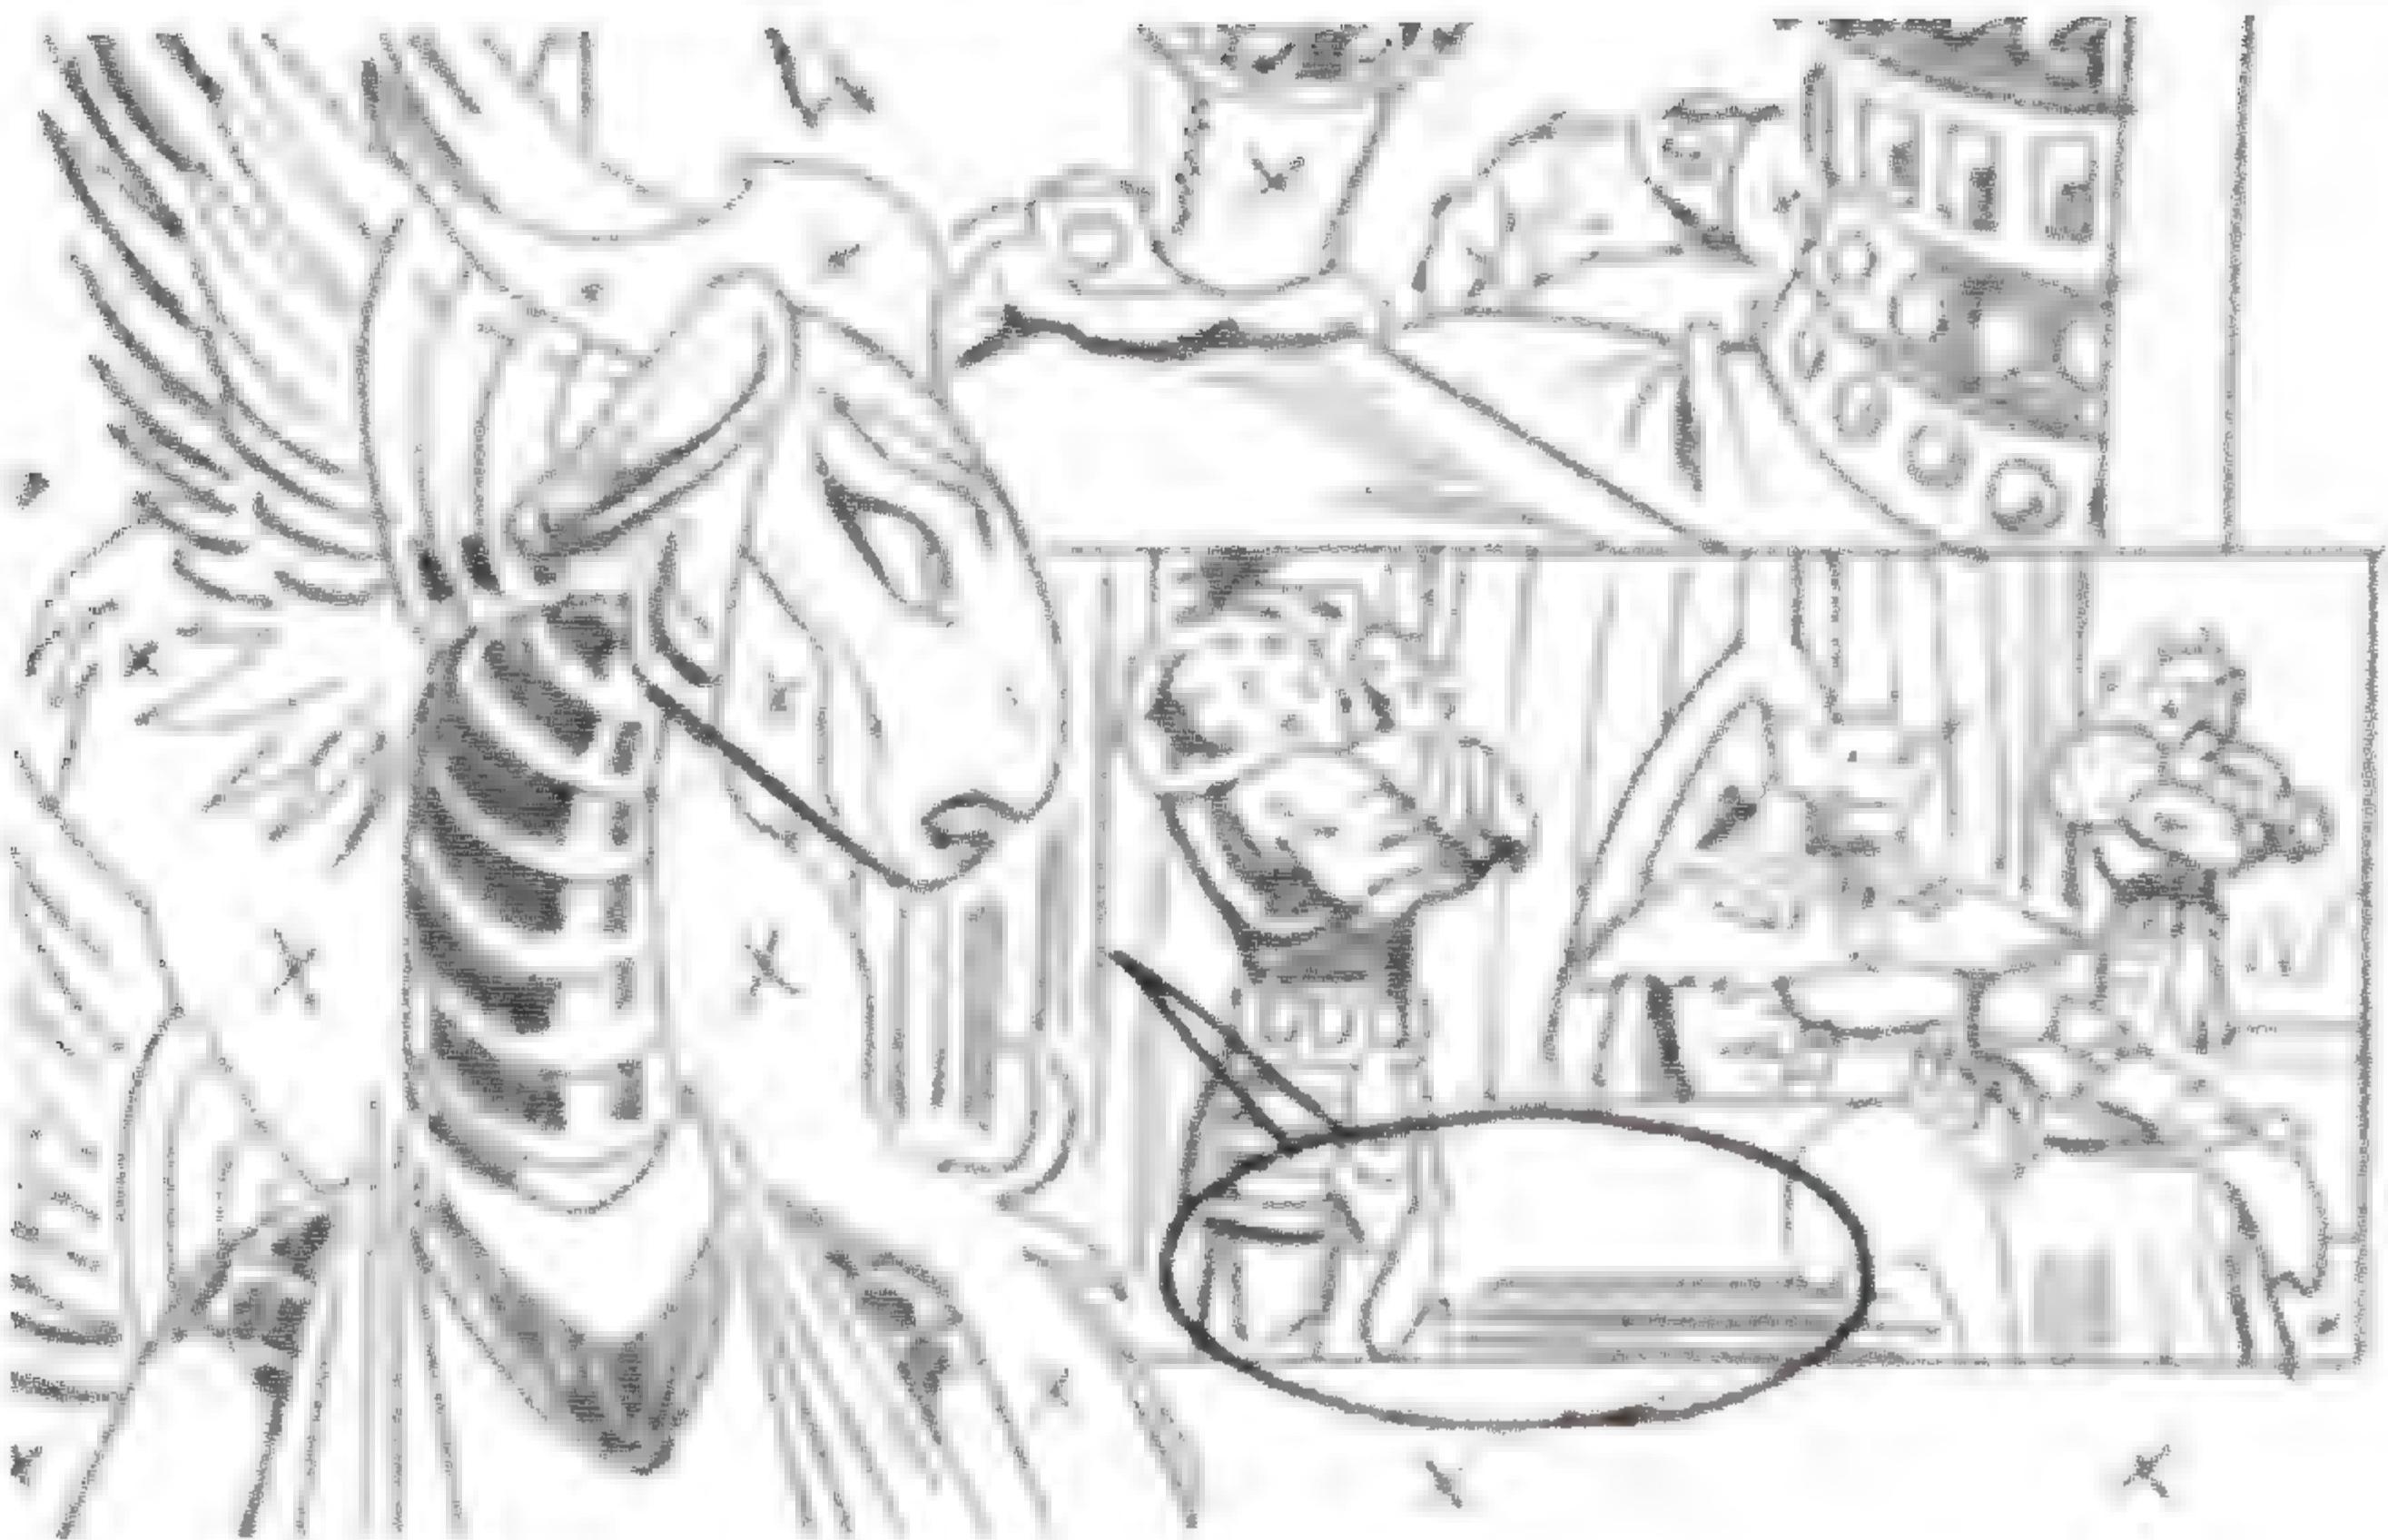

Next, I ink the background. For this picture I wanted to try something different, so to make the lightning strikes, I needed a less solid line. I soften the edges with a grease pencil or china marker.

Now a little Photoshop to crop the image and adjust the blacks. Oh, and I used the diffuse glow filter to tweak the lightning. That's it. Hope you like this Thor illo from Marvel's Ultimate books.

Respect: PUBLISHING “INDY” COMICS

by Thaddeus Branco

The process, if there is one, in running an Indy comic studio? To each his own. This is just how First Salvo works.

First Salvo began many years ago during the comic boom and the ensuing collapse. Persevering, we are currently ramping up new production on two mainline titles, Danger’s Dozen, drawn by Norm Breyfogle of Batman fame, and Contract, by the equally awesome Dave Ross. Colors for the Dozen, we should note, are by the new and talented Gabe El-Taeb – a passionate fella!

Danger’s Dozen tells the tale of post World War Two veterans made mad adventurers of the extreme, led by the bomber ace, Boss Aman. The series and original graphic novels will be our main focus, with release dates to be announced at www.firstsalvo.com – on our forums, and perhaps here in future issues of Sketch!

Contract follows the bounty hunters of Stellar Rangers, led by Jesse Garrett, beginning with a short mini-series in which organ thieves kidnap a young girl. Jessie and her Rangers must find the young girl before... she’s sold up.

How do we go about creating these mad stories? The ideas come first, with a good amount of obsession. To make it all work, the production is a constant focus. The ideas flow and must be put down on paper or in digital form so that they aren’t forgotten. In our case, the creators run the show, and collaborators and freelancers work from the direction of the partners.

Ideas are discussed and the plot and theme noted. After all the characters and events are put down – on a list of elements we wish to see in a story – a proper write-up is made. From this, the script is broken down. If a Salvo Partner is drawing, the script is still quite loose as work begins. Dialogue is decided for placement in layouts on the page. These are tight thumbnails, generated and simultaneously drawn with letter placement. With our professional artists – the scripts are tight and the dialogue is considered and sometimes placed by the artist for approval prior to final penciling and or inking.

Pencils are scanned and stored as digital files. Pencils are inked from original pencils or from blue-line-printed scans of pencils. Physical inks are scanned, although some of our collaborators are skilled at digital inking and darkening of pencils in the computer – with programs such as Photoshop. And some draw exclusively in the computer, from start to finish!

Flattening is performed on the inked files – which is the simple placement of large areas of flat colors to make final coloring easier for the colorist. The colors are then completed in Photoshop and stored once more as digital files. It is efficient and very economical to send pages as digital files. Pencils as grayscale TIFFs at 600 dpi; inks as 600 dpi bitmaps (sometimes as tiffs) and color files as 300 dpi CMYK files. ‘CMYK’ being the color inks for printing; CYAN, MAGENTA, YELLOW and ‘K’ for black.

Of course, lettering can't be forgotten, for comics are a mix of words and pictures! Letters and balloons are (for us) finished atop low-resolution versions of the pencils or inks as production continues. This is done in Adobe Illustrator with custom computer fonts. Lettering is an art and a storytelling tool all its own.

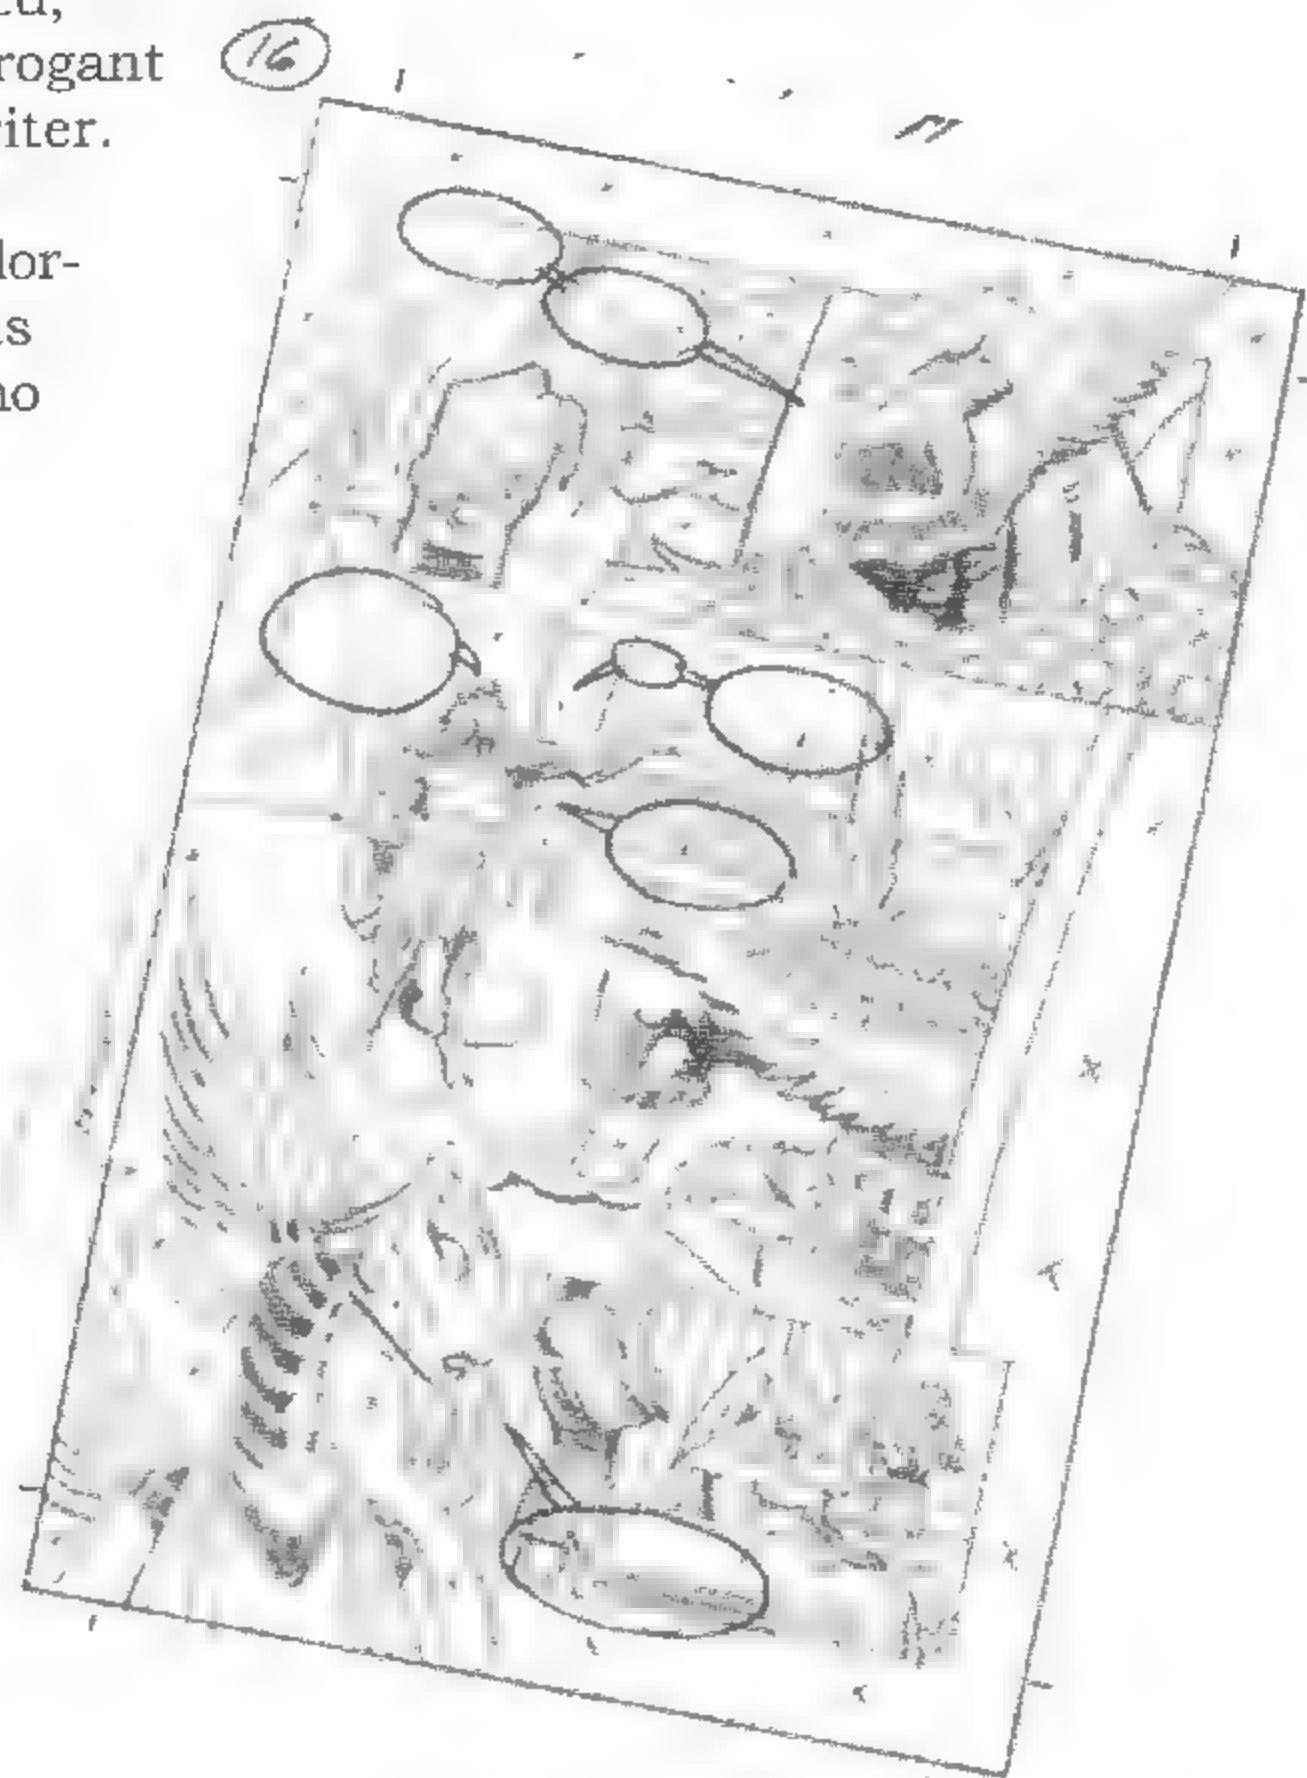

We have hand lettered in our past, and those who do this best are true artists!

You'd think production was the hardest part of publishing comics. It can be – what with writer's block, unworkable pages, or artists struggling for inspiration. There's humidity and curling paper; ink saturation problems and all the time lost by these. And let's not ignore the horror of files being lost or computers crashing! Or even distributor and printer conflicts. Any of these can put a quick end to a comic's schedule and success!

In truth, the true problems can originate with the people – personality clashes, artistic integrity and creative passions in conflict. All of these must be avoided and the egos and tempers managed. As a publisher or editor, the problem is not in keeping to budget, generating sales or juggling multiple schedules. No, editing and publishing requires working well with people (unless you are literally a ‘self-publisher’ – and even then, you have to work with distributors, printers, retailers, fans at conventions...). Working with and understanding each other keeps everyone on deadline and results in more inspired work.

There are many horror stories of disappearing, slow artists; or the opinionated, arrogant writer.

Of colorists who ignore fine details or the letterer who re-writes the script! Being a people-person won't avoid these disasters, but being a strict, fair collaborator, knowing your 'independent' comic is on the line, will. Put simply, success is impossible when working with negative personalities. No amount of polite behavior will solve these problems. BE polite, be professional and always pay the bills on time. If you work with responsible, dedicated and best yet – passionate – creators, then treat them with respect and treat them well. This is the surest bet to having a great creative team.

Respect must be given at all times, but if the publisher feels there is no respect being returned, or worse, none from printers, distributors or retailers – these comics will never reach readers, and it won't matter what readers may have thought. The purchasing power of your audience only goes so far if, as an 'Indy', you lack respect from the industry, or at any stage of production and distribution.

And respect and passion begins with you.

Now, as a special bonus, we have a short explanation of how our lead collaborator, Norm Breyfogle, produces his rarely seen pencil roughs! Art seen throughout this article has been generated from these first stages of loose pencils. Take it away Norm!

I've been penciling my comics pages at a size of 4.5" x 6.7" for years now, (whenever I ink myself,) which is just large enough for me to put in as much detailing as I need in order to ink it with little or no further pencilling required. (I thereby combine the thumbnail, roughs and final pencils into one stage). Then I blow them up to full size on a photocopier, and then ink them on a large lightbox. It isn't perfectly ideal and it took a little while to get used to, but it saves me a lot of time, and there's little to no resultant pencil lines or smudges on the final art to erase when the inking's done.

When I face the blank paper to design my thumbnail roughs, I first read the entire script (if I can; if it's available) and gather any visual reference I might require. Then I decide what panel or element on the page is the most important and/or the most dynamic. I try to envision a rough idea of the final page design with all the most important elements included and mentally prioritized. Then I typically start roughing in the first panel of the page, attempting to keep that vision in mind. Almost every time, I'll make some changes to my initial vision as the page works itself out on paper, and my 4.5" x 6.7" "finished" pencils usually are a combination of erasing and redrawing, cutting and pasting, or even (sometimes) photo collage.

I try to approach the entire page as one illustration rather than as a bunch of separate illos pieced together.

If I'm only penciling for someone else to ink, instead of inking it on the lightbox I pencil in all the detail on the lightbox (which is why I prefer to ink my own pencils: because the time I spend on fully pencilling on the lightbox is time I could just as easily spend inking on the lightbox instead).

And that's it. Thanks, Norm. We prefer this method Norm follows, as it allows final approval of pages prior to inks. Norm's also a very considerate person and respect flows both ways. So, that's all to say for now except –

Never... the end!

WHERE GOOD ARTIST GO BAD!

Advice from former publisher Mike Gagnon, joined by Chris Ryall of IDW & Erik Larsen of Image Comics

by Mike Gagnon

6. Pay – It's a touchy and sometimes guarded subject, but before getting involved in the work of illustrating comics it pays to ask around and understand what kind of compensation you should expect to be offered for your work. A good place to start is a book titled "How to Self Publish Your Own Comic Book" authored by former Now Comics publisher Tony C. Caputo. It's full of in-depth info and also carries a handy pay scale chart, just bear in mind that the book was published in 1997, so pay rates have gone up a bit since then.

The biggest thing to know is that you shouldn't expect to start out making top dollar. One of the most common mistakes I've seen a new artist make is refusing a job because they think they should get paid the same as a big name comic artist. Often new artists feel they are as good as or better than the pros, and therefore shouldn't work for anything less than those artists. What newcomers are failing to understand is that big name comic artists don't start out in the industry making top dollar. Any big name comic artist started out at the bottom of the ladder at the lowest pay scale, had to pay their dues and earn their reputation by turning out good artwork on time and build up a fan following. This can take decades to do. Many times when someone has made it and can begin requesting more money for their work it has less to do with their art improving and more to do with the years they've put in building a fan base and name recognition. Those artists are the people that can sell comics because their name is attached to it and they have a large enough fan base that will buy a comic just because that person did it. Those are the people who publishers can justify paying higher page rates to because those are the people that will sell enough comics for the publisher to make a return on their investment. This kind of recognition is built up over time and is created by building a reputation for quality art, meeting deadlines, and professionalism. This kind of recognition will not happen over night.

The harsh reality of it is that even when you do get your first big break, it's likely that not a single person who buys that comic will be buying it because of your name on the cover. They'll be buying it for the characters, the story, the content, and yes, maybe even it's the art that attracts them. You have to reward the people who buy your comic with a great experience and you have to create that experience repeatedly and every time someone picks up a comic you've worked on. In reality there are a large number of people who break in and have to work another job in order to make a living until, over time, they've worked up the ability to make a living exclusively on their page rates.

I can't stress this enough. It doesn't matter what art school you went to or how much you invested in that education. To get your break you still have to be willing to work for entry level page rates and work your way up, you can't start at the top. I get many new artists who've just graduated art school and turn down paying work because they feel it doesn't pay enough to help cover their investment in art school. Taking that position means you'll never break in. If you work like a professional you can definitely break into comics and make that investment in your education back. Just don't expect to make it back in the first year or even two.

Chris: “Unless you can take a time machine back to 1991, looking to get rich in comics is a pretty big mistake. But it’s a great creatively fulfilling place, too. But it can also be a grind, doing monthly books—to sweat it out like that every month, you’ve gotta love what you do.”

Erik: “Ideally, it’s best to love what you’re doing. The others are setting themselves up for heartbreak. Few creators strike it rich in this business. It’s happened—but it’s nothing you can count on necessarily.”

7. Buying your way in – This one is rare, but people do try it. I once had a lady call me out of the blue (a no-no) to tell me about her horror project that she had finished. She asked me a few questions about the company (which made it quite obvious that she had never bothered to read anything on our website or look up our submission guidelines). She then proceeded to ask me to convince her as to why she should send me a submission of her book. A little dumbfounded I explained to her that is not how the industry works. She then proceeded to ask me how much she could pay me per page to publish her work. When I explained that only a vanity publisher can do that she then closed the conversation with a request for me to send to her a sample of my horror writing, and if she liked it, she’d send me a proper submission of her work to consider.

I mean where do I start? Basically the thing to keep in mind is that if you’re sending work to a publisher, you’re supposed to be trying to get a paying job yourself, not paying them to publish your work. Any good, legit publisher should tell you not to pay to have your work published. If you’re going to pay to have work published you might as well have full control and just self-publish. Also, editors and publishers are very busy. Never try to put them in a position where they are supposed to beg you for a submission. They won’t.

In this case not only was it quite clear that the creator wasn’t familiar with my company at all (see next point), but that she hadn’t done her research or had any experience in the publishing or comics industry in general.

Chris: “...I’d never take money, and I’d hope an artist would never ‘pay to play.’ They never should.”

8. Not familiar with company – Another one that boggles the mind. If you don’t know anything about a company, and have never read anything they have published, how do you know they’re a place you want to send your artwork to? How do you know they’re looking for someone that can do what you do? Always do your research first. Assuming you’re not unemployed and you do have some small amount of money to spend, buy one of their books and see what kind of product they produce. Give it a few weeks and slowly pick up a small handful of their product. Realistically judge whether they produce anything similar in style or content to the work you do before sending a submission.

Chris: “In general, the biggest mistake I see is that people blanket the land with their submissions. If you send me the same sample pages you sent to a manga publisher or kids comic publisher, and yet I only publish more adult and non-superhero fare, well, I not only get no sense of whether your style would fit our books, but I also get a sense that you aren’t familiar with our books at all. So not paying attention to who you’re submitting what samples to can actually have an adverse effect, even if you’ve got the chops.”

Erik: “People don’t seem to grasp that this isn’t a lottery. We don’t publish every third pitch we receive. If we get ten lousy pitches in a day, we don’t green light ANY of those projects. If we get ten great pitches in a day, we’ll green light ALL of them. There are no ‘odds’ here. It’s not as though we accept a certain percentage of the pitches that we receive. People want to know what their chances are going in and it’s as simple as this: If your pitch is lousy, your chances of getting it approved are 0%—if it’s awesome your chances are 100%.

My recommendation? Make it awesome.”

9. Refusal to make changes – I'm winding down with a classic bait and switch tactic used by amateur artists, the old "Will you publish it if I make changes?"

Every few months I get a submission from someone who has amazing potential. These are the artists who aren't quite there, but if they could fix just a couple of things in their art fundamentals they could be a spectacular comic artist. These are the people I take extra time to encourage. These are the people who get a personal letter detailing what few minor things they can change in their artwork to make it professional quality.

As much as I enjoy these submissions I also cringe, knowing that I will get at least one response along the lines of: "That's a lot of work, before I take the time to do it, will you guarantee to publish it?"

Now every publisher understands that a good artist puts a lot of blood, sweat and tears into their work, but in this situation the artist has effectively asked me to publish artwork that doesn't exist. The artist still hasn't shown any initiative to turn in artwork that is of a professional level. When a publisher gives you advice on how to improve your artwork it is often advice that can be used to improve all of your artwork. This can help you not only get paying work with them, but other publishers. Asking for a guarantee to hire an artist based on hypothetical work shows a publisher that you don't feel it's worth your time to take advice unless they offer some extra incentive. Publishers and editors are busy people, and don't have to send you a personal letter regarding your submission. Appreciate the editor's time, take his advice, and if you do use the advice be sure to re-submit to that editor, reminding them of the previous submission.

If you think about it objectively and realistically, how can you expect an editor or publisher to agree to hire you when you haven't given them a chance to see how you've implemented their advice?

In closing, I'd like to clarify on behalf of myself and the extremely busy Chris Ryall and Erik Larsen that this article is not meant to poke fun at or discourage anyone from becoming a comic artist, only to give future comic artists the best possible head start at landing that first crucial gig.

What happened with the young man I met at the con? Well, I told him about some of the errors in his approach and gave him some pointers on how he could improve his chances in the future. Not surprisingly he responded "I'm an artist, not a writer!" He exchanged a few more words of polite, albeit agitated conversation, while quickly fumbling to get his material back into his shoulder bag. When he had his bag zipped up he quickly turned on his heel and without so much as a "Thanks for your time" quickly walked across the convention floor and out the door.

Where is he now? I can't say for sure. I got the impression that he didn't want to keep in touch. What I can tell you is that I still have that tear sheet from the first day I met him. I try to keep abreast of almost everything in this comics industry and I can tell you that his name has still not been attached to any comics being published now, or any time in the near future.

Special thanks to Chris Ryall at IDW Publishing and Erik Larsen at Image comics for lending their time and expertise for this article.

Letters Forum

Looking For Tones.

I'm getting back into cartooning after a long hiatus. Back in the day, I used zipatone screen to put the grey in my comic strips, but I guess they don't make them anymore. Everybody uses Adobe Photoshop, but I haven't learned how. If I have to, I guess I will, but since I'm just a hobby cartoonist, I don't know if it's better to learn Photoshop, or if I can find screen tones somewhere.

Doug Wong

Doug,

I've heard of artists even making their own zip with Photoshop. It sounds intriguing to me, really...now I just need to get the Photoshop program! I think that beyond the zip issue, you'll find all kinds of other bells and whistles to play with, more tools for your tool belt. I'd look into it.

To the BLP crew,

I just wanted to let you all know that this is one of the most useful comic book art instruction books that I have ever picked up! There are so many tips and tools that I've (RE)learned to use since I picked this up, that I want to go back and expand my Sketch collection! What both Airbrush Action Magazine and The Artist magazine mean to me when I need tips on painting, this magazine will mean to me as I expand my knowledge of comic book art and production! I don't know why I wasn't a consistent reader before... oh yeah... the airbrushing.

Keep up the fantastic work!

As an active member of the Blue Line Art message board, it's gratifying to see you and the others use the things you keep learning by challenging yourselves and each other. You have helped make the message board more of a community of creators gathering together to try things out and expand your knowledge.

Keep reading Sketch Magazine and we hope to keep being that tool you keep using.

Hello!

I was interested in purchasing the Manga Studio 3.0 Debut, but I had a few questions before I made my final purchase.

I already have Photoshop CS2 so I was wondering if Manga Studio 3 is compatible with it? Can I simply import the templates from MS 3.0 into Photoshop or does MS 3.0 function independently? What are the benefits of using Manga Studio 3 as opposed to Photoshop? I see that there are quite a few background templates, can these be manipulated in Photoshop also?

Thank you for taking the time to answer my questions. I am a fan of Blue Line Artwork and I use it in all my comics, including Pretentious Record Store Guy, which is available online at <http://www.pretentiousrecordstoreguy.com>.

Carlos Ruiz

Carlos,

I spoke with the tech guys for Manga Studio 3.0 and they said that you could use all of the tones and effects from Manga Studio. And they stressed that the program itself is a great tool if you're looking to create comic books.

Robert

Glad you're listening...

The latest issue of Sketch was exactly what I suggested. The glossy paper and extra color adds a lot to the issue.

I've been a subscriber from early issues and plan on staying around for a while.

William Avery

William,

We do all we can to please our readers.

Robert

William,

While what Bob said is true, I want to repeat what I said last issue. Finding a new printer who can get us back onto better paper and back in color is an awesome deal, both for you, the reader, and us. I'm always proud of the way Sketch turns out, but last issue just looked cool!

Now talk about the content.

What parts of the magazine did you read? Are there parts of it you go back to? Did you learn anything about creating comics? That's what I'd like to know... Write back next issue and let me know because now I'm curious...

*Best,
Bill*

Another issue I'd like to address is that there is a difference between Sketch Magazine and Wizard Magazine. Both talk comics, but the focus is different for us. We don't give you a price guide or previews of what's coming out this month. We talk about creating comics around here for the most part. We're starting to expand that more into the indie market and webcomics. Comics is comics, you know? So, if you have suggestions, drop us a line. There are a lot of books out there and a lot of creative folks who could maybe use a dose of exposure. Throw in a How To article about publishing a small-press comic, and you have it: a reason for Sketch Magazine to be..

We can't do it alone.

And I'm not going to continue to address the issue of the catalogue in the middle. It helps defray the cost by doing that rather than by worrying about finding advertisers every issue. And there's some cool stuff in there!

Interviews-we get requests to interview this artist or that one. We want to do all of them! BUT we don't always have the access we want or schedules conflict. Keep suggesting and we'll keep trying to get you the creative people you want us to bring you.

Write us. Tell us your thoughts. Ask your questions.

Inkblots

A LOOK AT INKING HISTORY

by Bob Almond

Class is now in session, students...so please open up your reference books.

Yes, inkophiles, inking isn't all smudges, smears & spills (well, hopefully it isn't); there's some research involved if you want to be well-rounded.

When I was a kid in the mid-seventies there weren't any books that I was aware of showing us aspiring comic makers how to do stuff like inking.

That was the case until Stan Lee & John Buscema's How to Draw Comics the Marvel Way appeared in 1978. My friends and I poured through that tome in hopes of possessing the wondrous secrets within. The Art of Inking was the sole chapter on that craft, not that I was intending at that time to focus on that specialty...like everyone I wanted to draw! With the book's guidance we produced homemade comics. It was the path of practicing that we solely followed since there weren't any other venues available to us for some time to come.

I later discovered as I finished high school that there weren't any comic book courses available at most universities and that, in fact, the only two schools that I was aware of that had specialized training was the New York School of Visual Arts (SVA) to a limited degree and The Joe Kubert School of Design in New Jersey. But I could afford neither. I attended my local college University of Massachusetts: Dartmouth (UMass) and took up illustration and met other students with similar dreams as my own to make it into funnybooks. It was there that I got academic training in various forms of art from painting to photography to calligraphy and to drawing.

This would all still significantly help me since as any comic professional or comic ref manual to follow would tell you, first and foremost learn to draw from life, not from your favorite comic artist. This way you learn the foundations of figure drawing and object drawing, how shadows & light function, composition and design, etc. and not just the style and, often, the shortcomings of a 'cool' comic artist which we all initially attempt.

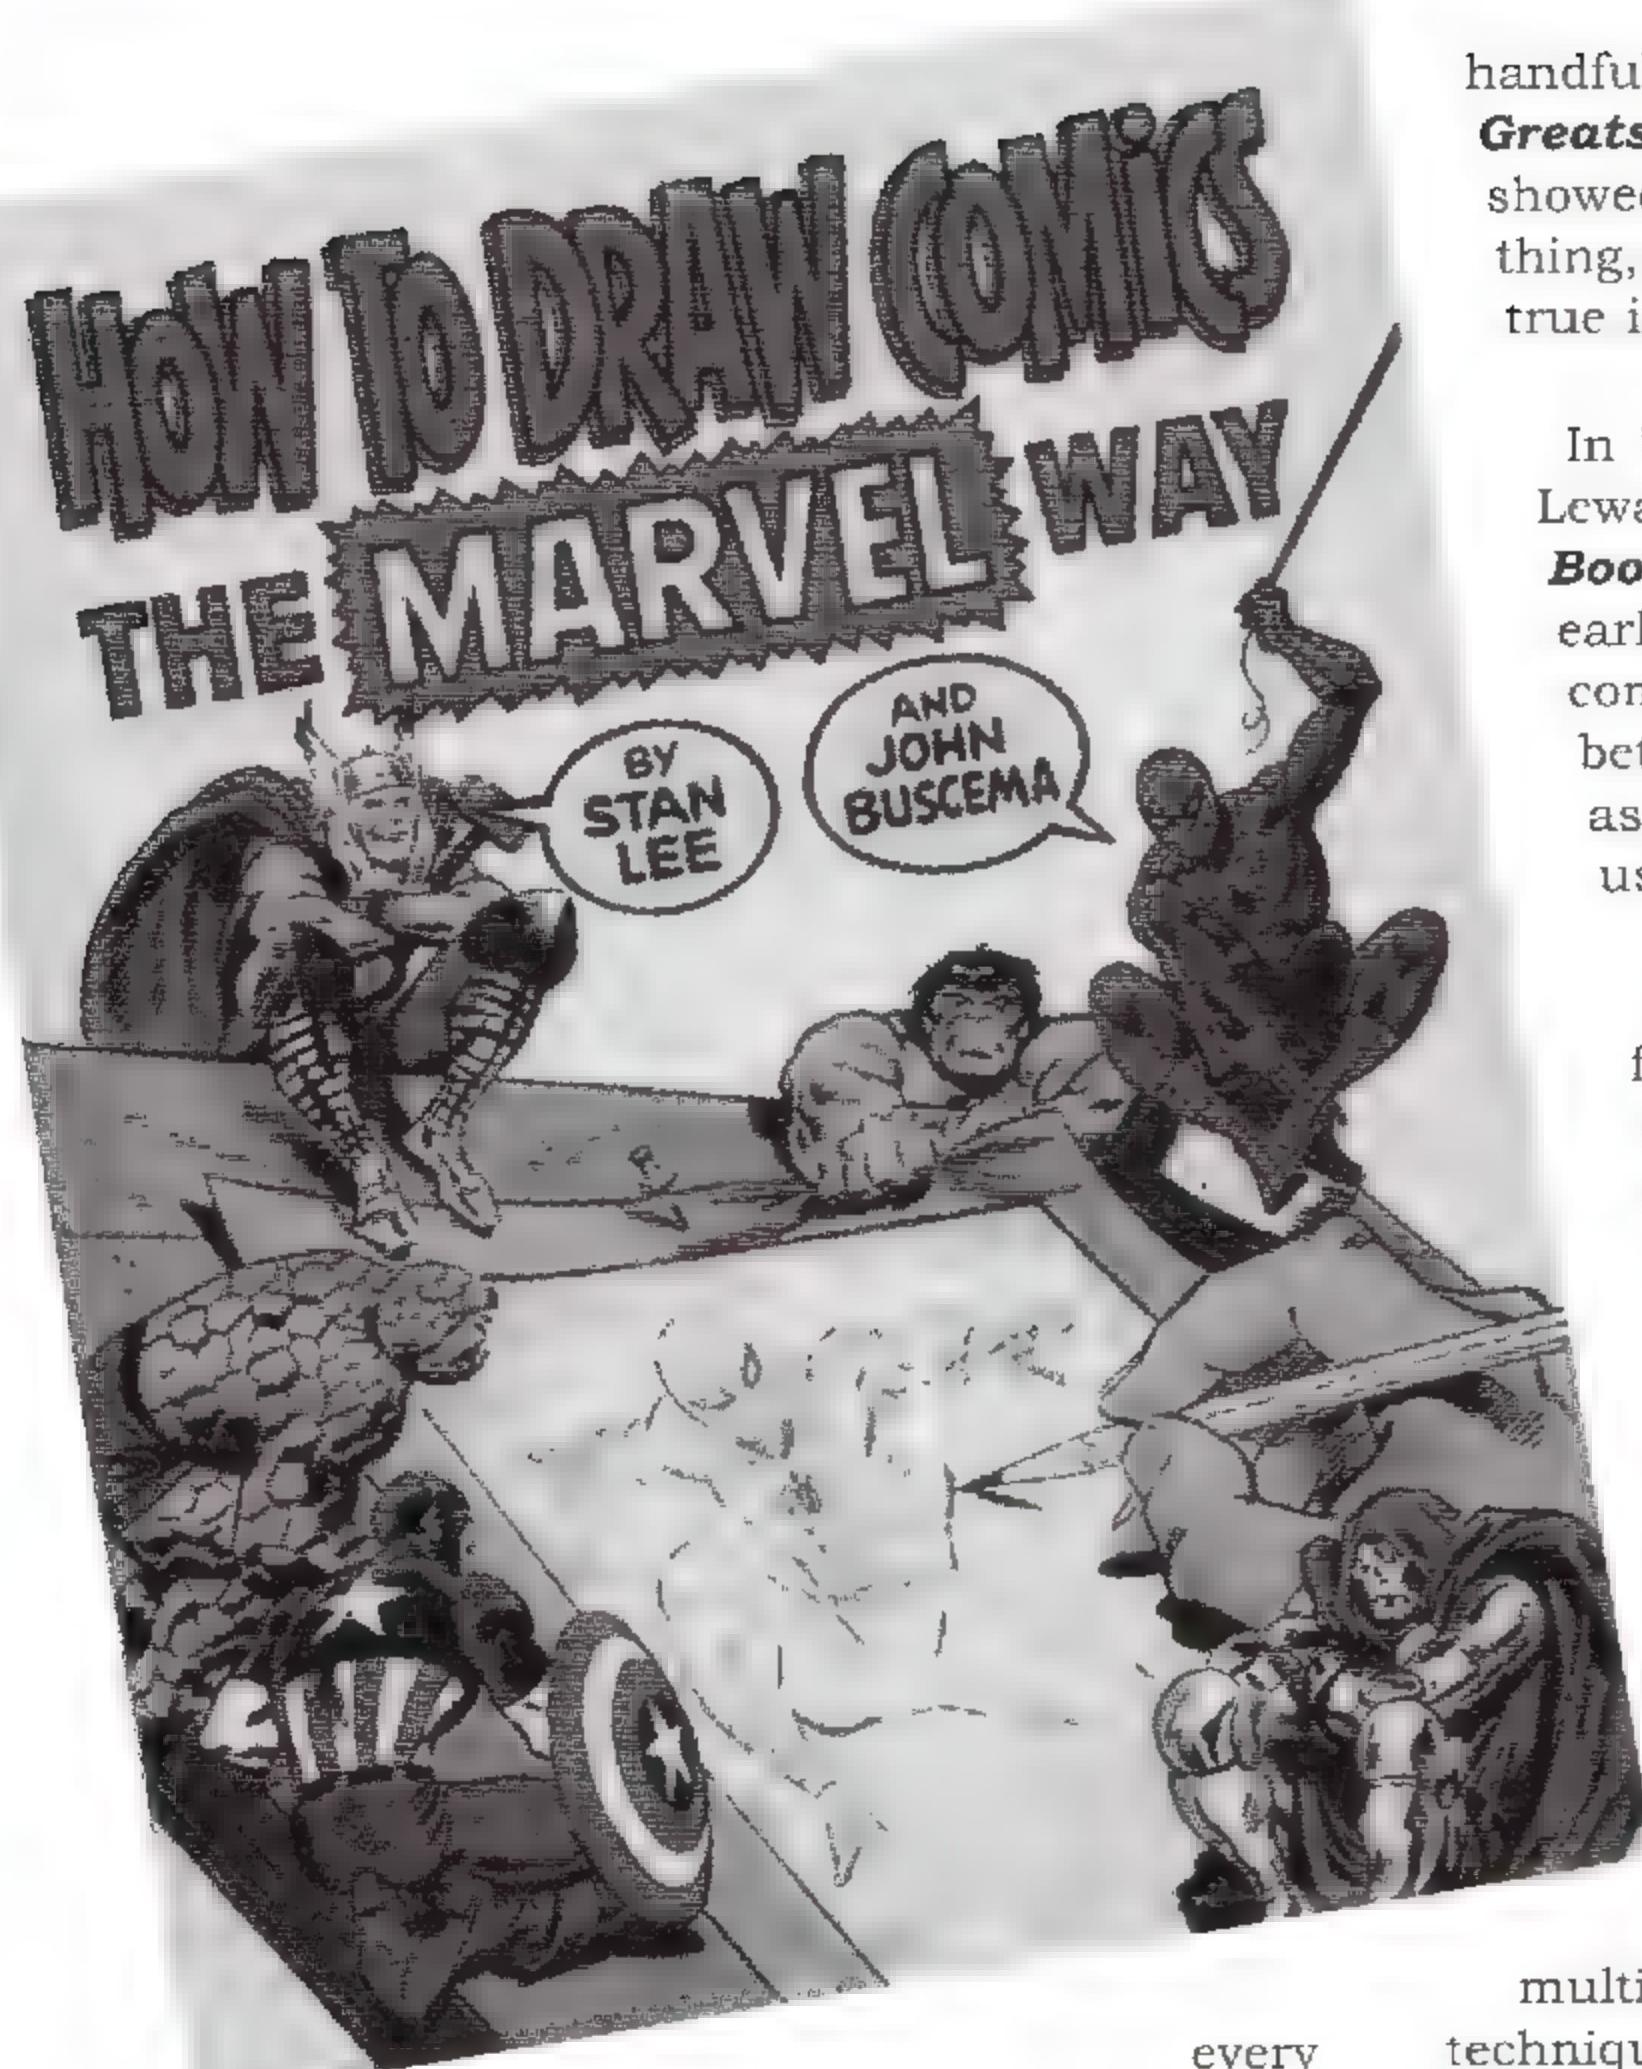

During this time I discovered some more books being published on comic book art. In '87 I bought How to Draw and Sell Comic Strips by Alan McKenzie, which was very informative, especially with shoptalk and tools. Then in '89 I got How to Draw Art for Comic Books by James Van Hise, which was okay but not great with application. In '86 I bought Rich Buckler's Secrets of Drawing Comics # 1 (were there more issues?) and while it didn't cover inking, it was fun and helpful.

Over time I discovered other books like Will Eisner's 1985 Comics & Sequential Art and from 1995 his Graphic Storytelling. They didn't focus on inking, but at this time neither was I, so I simply absorbed them for their valuable sequential information. I was trying to learn as much as I could and break into the industry in any manner possible so I kept absorbing what I could.

When I was hired by Marvel in '92 I was hired as an inker due to 3 pages of inking samples that I had done for another publisher (I'll cover my 'origin' in another column). Unlike many inkers who had trained as inking assistants I had no such experience, only what I knew from research materials and practice from college and after graduation. My editors said to just "ink what was there on the page and the rest will come over time".

I wanted to accelerate that development so I exclusively reviewed and studied some of my favorite inkers' work like Joe Rubinstein, Mark Farmer, Tom Palmer, Bob Layton (among others) and especially Terry Austin, who had just left the assignment that I inherited, Warlock & the Infinity Watch.

I asked my editor if I could contact some inkers on the phone for info & advice and he connected me with Joe Rubinstein, Terry Austin, and Tom Christopher (who used to assist Joe but was now inking solo on Silver Surfer). Joe & Tom were kind and gracious to me but completely different in their outlook. Joe asked me a lot of questions regarding my background, what tools I used and some general shoptalk. Then he explained every type of brush & quill tip that he used and for what effect.

Terry asked nothing and explained nothing of his inking arsenal or approach to it. He just said "whatever works for you, use it". He wasn't being rude; far from it...he was just being a realist, practical and not pretentious.

Tom was helpful being that he only went solo shortly before me so he could relate to where I was at (or not at). I remember him saying that the first 3-4 years I would not know a darn thing (even if I thought that I did) and that it would all kick in after that. And he was right. I appreciate what all three of these talents brought to the table for me. I subsequently ordered several kinds of pen nibs and brushes in order to try them out and see what worked for me.

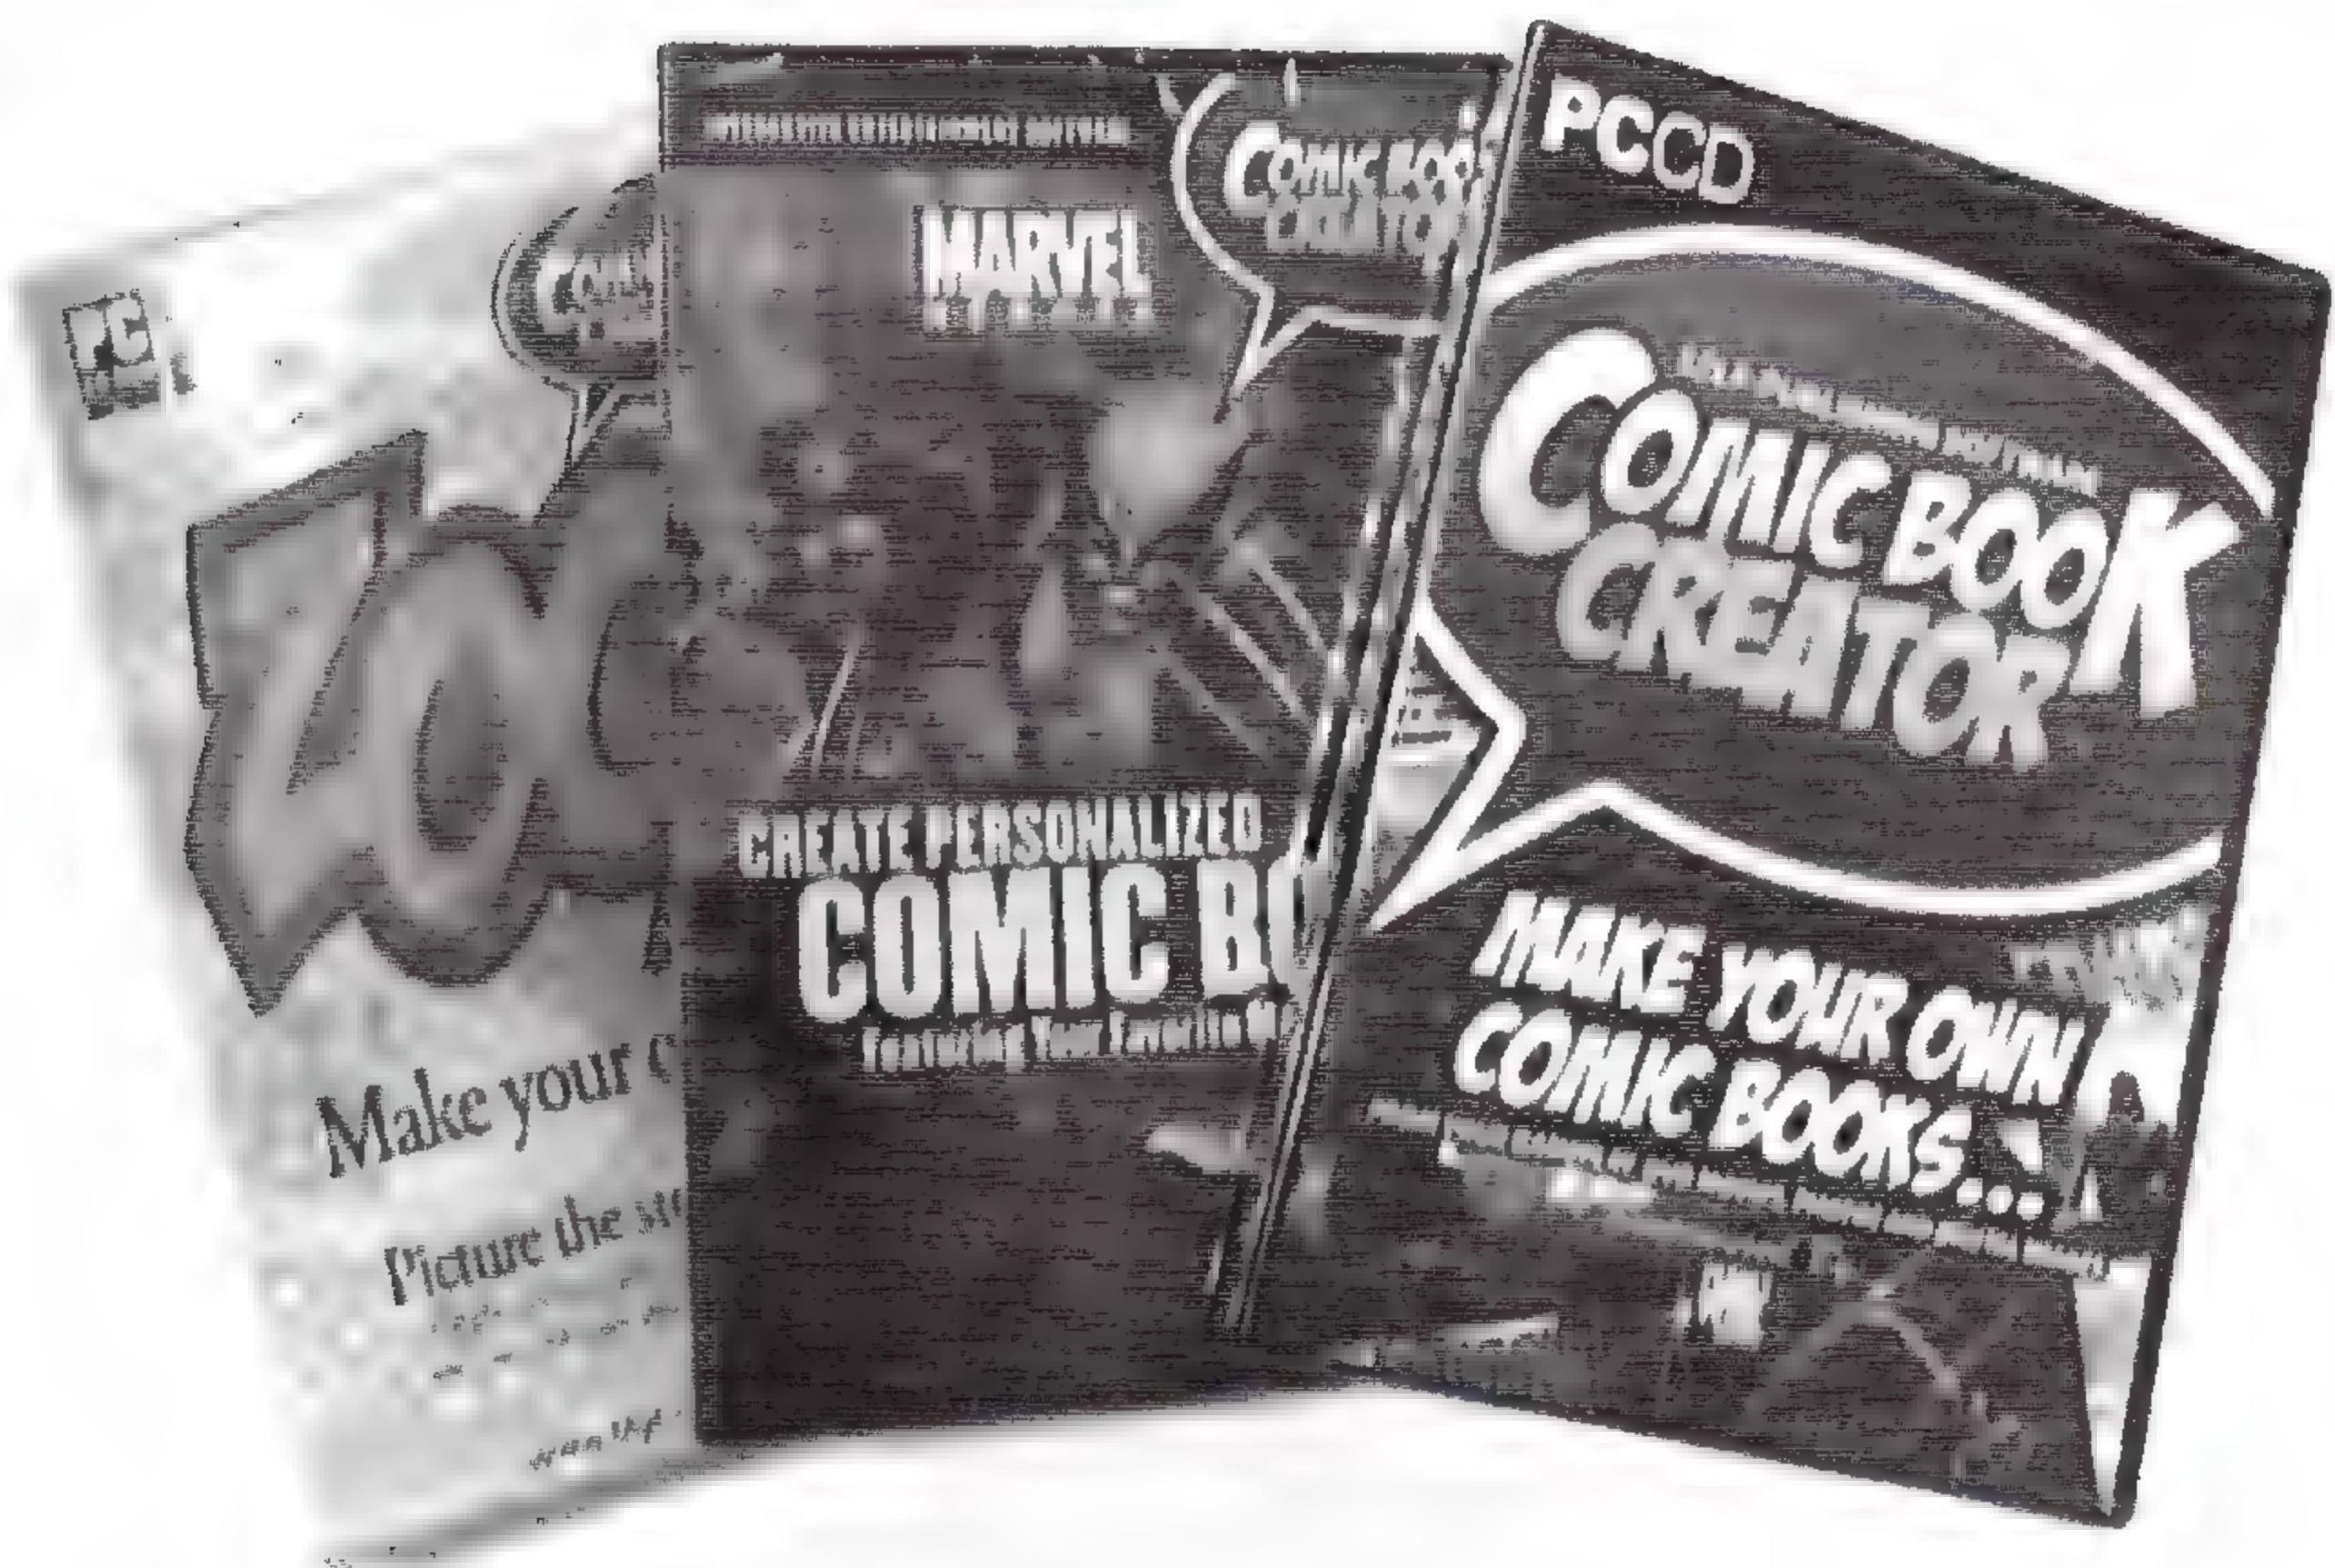

The ironic thing is that AFTER I broke in EVERYBODY was producing How To-books or videos. It made it easy for me when I was recruiting & training my own assistants because I could now recommend that they check out a handful of material. There was The Comic Book Greats video series hosted by Stan Lee which showed the founding Image artists doing there thing, although I don't recall if there was any true inking displayed.

In '95 Marvel submissions editor John Lewandowski edited the new Marvel Try-Out Book (I missed the original edition years earlier). It briefly explained every craft of comic production and had inking comparisons between three inkers in the inking section as well as blue lined Strathmore boards to use for samples.

In '97 and '02 Dark Horse published two fine books by inker Gary Martin: The Art of Comic Book Inking, Vols. 1 & 2 respectively. I found these books to be a great aid to the fledgling ink artist, especially since over a dozen pro inkers in each volume took a hand at inking the same page by Steve Rude for comparison's sake and explanations on their tools and theories as well as blue-lined boards to use. And in 2003 Klaus Janson did The DC Comics Guide to Inking Comics (I believe that he'd also done a penciling edition). I found this book insightful but in a different way. It was full of multiple comparisons of inking styles and techniques by various artists but Klaus himself approaches his own inking in such a different way than others that he seems to go against the grain, and yet it works for him.

This is where I stop because I haven't bought anything more than I've listed here. It's not that I'm not an "amateur" anymore...I truly feel that I can learn more. It's just that since around 2000 I can't keep up with the new products being solicited and I'd go broke on an inkers salary. I'm sure that there's now a plethora of books and DVDs out there on writing, drawing, inking, lettering, coloring, and self-publishing comics...I've passed by the solicitations in the Previews catalog repeatedly. And that's a good thing for all newbies who crave the info and want to educate themselves and break in. Just be careful to scope out what you're getting because with the glut of material some of it's bound to be not as good as others, which is what I learned in my adventures. Between research and hands-on training you'll have the best of both worlds, a wealth of knowledge and personal experience.

COMIC BOOK CREATOR

Software: Toy or Design Tool?

by Robert Wayne Hickey

I was able to spend a little time with the company that created Comic Book Creator and ask them a few questions about the abilities and functions of the software. From my conversation and having spent a little time playing around with the software, I believe you could use this as a tool in producing your comic books.

Now, if you're used to using Photoshop or Illustrator, then you won't need this program but, if you draw each panel individually and want to place them into a template adding standard/professional looking word balloons, then this program will help. What it won't do is scan or color your artwork. You have to already have it saved as a .jpg file and ready to be inserted into the panels. It does offer a ton of tools to resize and crop within a panel, composing artwork within a pre-designed page, lettering and exporting for publishing.

Comic Book Creator could be a simple tool to use if you have no knowledge of more expensive software.

It's a toy, yes, but definitely a tool that could be used in creating comics.

Inside Sketch This Month . . .

CONTRIBUTORS

Robert Wayne Hickey

Along with his duties as publisher of Sketch Magazine, he is the creative force behind Blood & Roses, StormQuest, and Tempered Steele. He currently has a new Blood and Roses project in the works that will be appearing at www.bloodandroses.com. Bob is one of the co-founders of Blue Line Art.

He can be reached at bobh@bluelinepro.com

Bill Nichols

As editor of Sketch Magazine, Bill welcomes the chance to educate and help other pros to pass along their hard-earned knowledge of All Things Comic Book.

Bill has inked for Knight Press (StormQuest, Blood and Roses, Dead Kid Adventures), Caliber Press (Raven Chronicles, LegendLore, Magus) and others. Upcoming inkings include Spike vs. Dracula from IDW and artwork for the short film Zombie Prom. And maybe a few other things...you never know...

Tom Bierbaum

Tom, with wife Mary, has scripted such comics as Legion of Super-Heroes and The Heckler for DC Comics, Xena and Return to Jurassic Park for Topps Comics, Star for Image Comics and Dead Kid Adventures, a creator owned project by Knight Press.

Bob Almond

A comics fan since the age of nine, Bob instantly set his career goal on breaking into the funny book biz. After graduating with a BFA in illustration from UMass Dartmouth in 1990, Bob was hired at Marvel two years later to ink Warlock & The Infinity Watch after the departure of Terry Austin. During the next ten years working for Marvel he had an (ink-stained) hand in projects like Silver Surfer, Starmasters, Ultragirl, Star Trek: DS9, Slingers and is probably most known for his 3-year critically-acclaimed run with Priest & Sal Velluto on Black Panther. Bob lives in New Bedford, Massachusetts with his wife Diane, 10-year-old son Nathan & cat Tux. You can visit his website The Bob Almond Inkwell at <http://www.almondink.com>

Mike Gagnon

For comic books Mike has written The Unforgiven for Lightningstrike Publishing, and Mason: Sweet Sacrilege for SMASH! Comics. He recently had a graphic novel published titled Monkeys & Midgets with several comic and graphic novel projects in production through various publishers and through self-publishing efforts. He's written books such as: The Art of Gerard Gagnon, Easy Business Ideas and How to get published... A manual on how to work and maintain a relationship with a small press publisher, all of them published by Open Book Press.

Gary Barker

Gary earliest professional experience was designing and illustrating concert posters for such groups/celebrities as ELO, Bob Seger, Jimmy Buffet, Andy Kaufman and others through the company Serigraphics.

In 1983, he accepted a position with Jim Davis, primarily penciling the Garfield comic strip, but also created countless drawings and concept sketches for such licensees as NASCAR with Richard Petty, Hallmark, Mead, and Scholastic Books. In addition, he worked on the Garfield 25th anniversary book: In Dog Years I'd Be Dead, pencilng the cover, dust jacket and creating many new illustrations exclusive to the tome. Further, he worked on storyboards for many of the Garfield television specials, developed product art for plush, apparel, toys, stationary and publishing, including the co-creation of Garfield's Pet Force, an illustrated book series by Scholastic Books showcasing Garfield and cast as super-heroes.

As a comic book artist, Gary has worked with such publishers as Marvel, DC, Image, Dark Horse, The Boy Scouts of America and others to produce sequential illustration, cover art and promotional images for comic books, magazines and trading cards.

Gary has been teaching in adjunct at The Ringling School of Art and Design since fall of 2004.

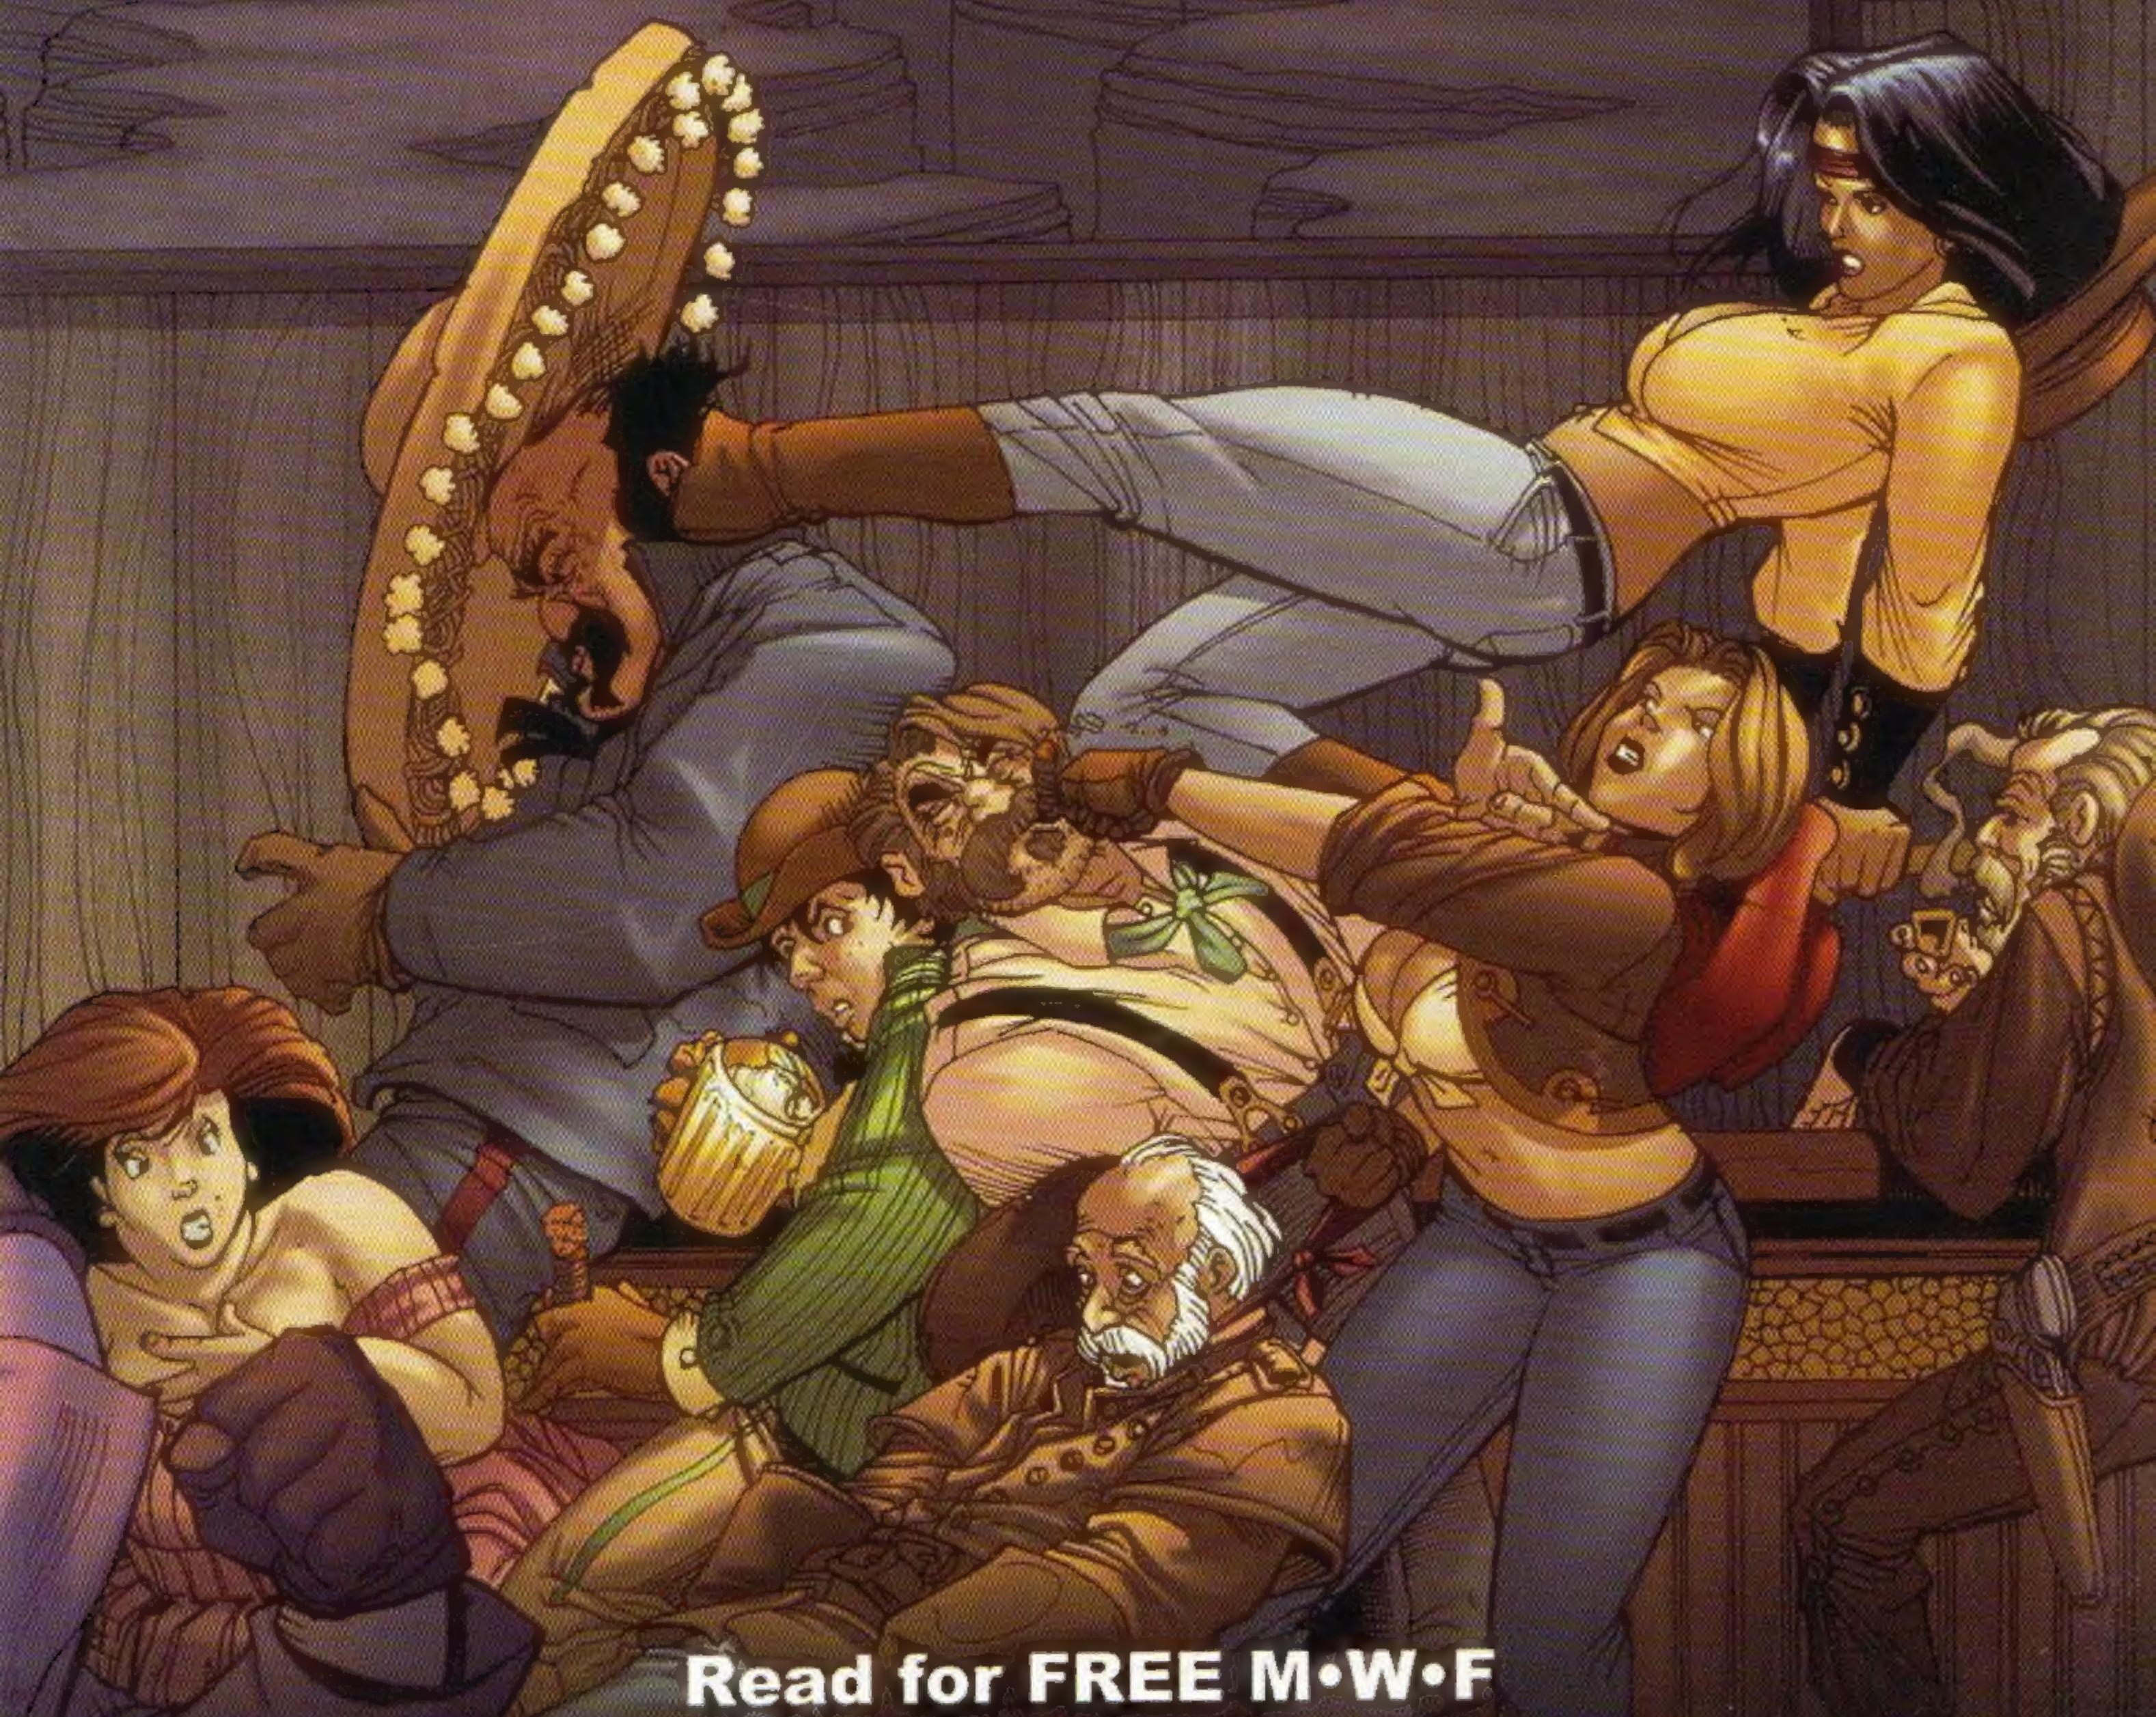

Gary has a Bachelor of Arts degree from the University of Indianapolis.

Rudy Garcia

Rudy has been in the toy industry since 1996, starting as a concept designer for Trendmasters, Inc., producing concept artwork for action figures, games and seasonal decorations. That lead Rudy to his first full-time sculpting position at McFarlane Toys in 1999 where he designed as well as sculpted such memorable pieces as Tortured Souls, Spawn: Samurai Wars and the 18" Freddy Krueger. In 2001, Rudy went the freelance route and began his long-term working relationship with Diamond Select Toys. Working mainly on the Marvel line, he has produced a number of statues, busts and action figures over the past six years, but his favorites by far have been the Marvel Icons and the Marvel Zombies.
